CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

PART IV.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From April 11, 1874, to May 19, 1874.]

INTERNATIONAL LAND AND IMMIGRATION COMPANY.

Mr. HERNDON, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 2888) to incorporate the International Land and Immigration Company; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN TEXAS.

Mr. GIDDINGS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2889) to provide for ascertaining the amount of damages sustained by citizens of Texas from marauding bands of Indians and Mexicans upon the frontiers of Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

L'ANSE AND VIEUX DE SERT BANDS OF INDIANS.

Mr. RICHMOND, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, a bill (H. R. No. 1698) for the relief of the L'Anse and Vieux de Sert bands of Chippewa Indians, in the State of Michigan; which, with an accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

IRRIGATION OF SAN JOACHIM AND SACRAMENTO VALLEYS.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives five thousand copies of the report of the commissioners on irrigation, appointed under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for a board of commissioners to report a system of irrigation for the San Joachim and Sacramento Valleys, California," approved March 3, 1873.

ALIENS AS ENGINEERS AND PILOTS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report with an amendment, from the Committee on Commerce, the bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots. There is necessity for prompt action upon the subject.

The bill was read. It provides that any alien who in the manner provided for by law has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States may be licensed, as if already naturalized, to serve as an engineer or pilot upon any steam-vessel, subject to inspection under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the second line of the bill insert, after the words "become a citizen of the United States," the words "and who shall have been a permanent resident of the United States for at least six months immediately prior to the granting of such license."

Mr. MERRIAM. Does this bill interfere with the pilotage laws of the State of New York as they now exist?

Mr. CONGER. It does not interfere with the pilotage laws of any State. It is an amendment of a law which expressly excepts the pilotage laws of that State from its operation.

Mr. MERRIAM. Then I do not object.

Mr. COX. Has this bill been approved by a majority of the committee?

Mr. CONGER. I think it was passed unanimously by the committee, though there may have been one or two members dissenting.

Mr. COX. At whose suggestion is the measure brought forward?

Mr. CONGER. I cannot tell.

Mr. BROMBERG. I do not object to the bill, but I wish to record my objection to the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say that all the vessels on the frontier are now being fitted out with their pilots. Unless this bill be passed as now presented citizens of Western States will, under a construction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be deprived——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If this is to be debated I call for the regular order.

Mr. COX. I think there can be no objection to the bill. It appears to be a perfectly safe measure.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at seventeen minutes past twelve o'clock. The committees will be called for reports of a private nature.

KENTUCKY ELECTION CASE.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the report of the Committee on Elections on the case of Mr. JOHN D. YOUNG.

The resolution reported by the committee was read as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN D. YOUNG, sitting member, was duly elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the tenth congressional district of Kentucky, and is entitled to his seat.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CROSSLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1600) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton.

MRS. ANNE M. ENGLISH.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the memorial of Mrs. Anne M. English; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM J. BLACKISTONE.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 554) for the relief of William J. Blackistone, of Saint Mary's County, Maryland; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DABNEY WALKER.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2890) for the relief of Dabney Walker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A. G. COLLINS.

Mr. HOWE also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1272) for the relief of A. G. Collins; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. LOUISA ELLIS.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2891) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Ellis, of Sandusky, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SILOMA DECK.

Mr. AVERILL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle losses sustained by Mrs. Siloma Deck in the year 1862, by depredations committed by the Sioux Indians in Minnesota, and to pay from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $1,095.37, which settlement shall be in full for all claims arising from such depredations.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman give the House an explanation of this bill?

Mr. AVERILL. The bill provides for the payment for losses of a claimant in Minnesota; losses which took place in 1862, during the Indian outbreak. It will be remembered that in 1863 Congress authorized the appointment of a commission to go to Minnesota and to examine all claims arising from Indian depredations. This claimant, a poor but most worthy German woman, whose husband had been killed, went from Minnesota immediately after her misfortunes, being poor, having nothing left. The Indians had destroyed the entire amount of her property. She went to New York, and being unable to speak the English language, did not know of the law that was passed by Congress authorizing the adjustment of these claims. Hence she was shut out entirely.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill does not in any manner commit the House on the subject of Indian depredations. It is simply to remove the bar of limitations of the statutes that this woman may avail herself of the same rights that were granted to others under similar circumstances.

Mr. SPEER. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I should like a further explanation of the effect of this bill if passed. As I understand it, a general law was passed applying to a large number of persons, and this claimant was shut out by reason of the statute of limitations.

Mr. AVERILL. The gentleman will remember the great Indian outbreak of 1862. I presume it is needless for me to enter into details in regard to that.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That the gentleman may apprehend my point, let me ask a further question. Does he state that a general law was passed for the relief of a great many persons and that this claimant was deprived of her right simply in consequence of her absence from the State? Is that all there is of it?

Mr. AVERILL. That is all.

Mr. GARFIELD. She would have got relief, as I understand the gentleman, under the general law, if she had been in Minnesota.

Mr. AVERILL. Yes, sir; without doubt.

Mr. GARFIELD. And it is now simply a question of removing the bar of the statute of limitations.

Mr. AVERILL. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. And this does not commit us to reopen these claims except so far as this person is concerned.

Mr. AVERILL. It does not. And it may not be improper to add, in regard to that general law, that Congress authorized an appropriation of something like $1,100,000 to be paid out of any moneys due to these Indians by the Government, which had been confiscated—one sum of about $3,000,000 of moneys received for lands sold by the Indians to the Government, and another sum of $3,000,000 of annuities on which they were receiving interest. This amount was all deducted from their annuities and moneys funded; so that it did not, in fact, take any money from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SPEER. I understand that this lady failed to avail herself of the benefits of the general law through ignorance of its provisions.

Mr. AVERILL. Through ignorance, and because it was impossible, she being in New York at the time. I will add further, for the information of the House, that there is not, to the extent of my knowledge, another case of this kind in the State of Minnesota.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2892) for the relief of Thomas Simms, late a lieutenant in the Seventy-sixth New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBURN, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes.

The substitute was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to set apart a tract of land, not exceeding twenty acres in extent, in the United States military reservation of Camp Douglas, near Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, to be used as a public cemetery, under such rules and regulations as he shall establish for the protection, care, and management of such cemetery. And he shall cause the same to be laid off and platted in convenient and suitable lots, which shall be forever devoted for the purpose of the burial of the dead. And he may set apart forever to each of the religious denominations organized in Salt Lake City which shall file with him proof of their organization a lot not to exceed one acre in size, and of convenient shape, which such denominations may inclose and ornament as they see fit, to be used for the purposes of burial; and two acres shall be reserved as a potter's field, or common burying-ground, which may be inclosed and ornamented by the authority of the said city.

Mr. SPEER. Is not that a public bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PELHAM. I raise the point of order that that bill makes an appropriation of public property, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. If the cremation process, of which we hear so much, shall be adopted, it will render it unnecessary to make any appropriation for cemetery purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama raises the point of order that the bill appropriates public property, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. The Chair sustains the point made by the gentleman, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition or William Carl, musician Fourth Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, for correction of his record; and the same was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2412) for the relief of Sheridan O. Bremmer, late a private of Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2893) for the relief of F. O. Wyse; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2894) for therelief of Amanda M. Smyth, widow of the late Brevet Major-General Thomas A. Smyth; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NATHAN COLE.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Cole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, and to ask its consideration now.

The bill was read for information. It proposes to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to credit Nathan Cole, late captain and brevet major of the Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, in the settlement of his accounts with the United States, with the sum of $120.80, the said sum having been collected by him while acting as agent of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands at Lewisville, Arkansas, in 1867, and lost in transmission to the proper receiving and disbursing officer at Little Rock.

Mr. SPEER. I do not wish to raise the point of order on that bill, but I request the gentleman who has charge of it to make an explanation to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it better that bills of this character should go to the Committee of the Whole at once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, as the gentleman from Indiana will observe, instead of waiting for the point of order to be made on private bills, now thinks that the laboring oar should be on the other shoulder, and asks unanimous consent to have them considered in the House, so that the rule will be that a private bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole, and unanimous consent to have it considered in the House must be distinctly given. That, the Chair thinks, is the fair way of dealing with the matter.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report a bill obviating the necessity for issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is that a private bill?

Mr. BUCKNER. The object of the bill is merely to confirm rights already granted by the United States to public lands; it does not affect the rights of the Government in any way.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not that the bill makes an appropriation of property, but that it is not a private bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. It affects private parties alone.

The SPEAKER. But it affects a whole class of private parties, all who live in the State of Missouri of this character.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is true.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules it is not a private bill, and not in order under this call.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am willing that the bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It could not go the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let it go on the other calendar.

The SPEAKER. Under the point of order the bill will be returned to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] and it can be reported in order under the public call.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask that the bill and accompanying report be printed and recommitted.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent, not to be brought back upon a motion to reconsider.

No objection was made; and the bill (H. R. No. 2895) was accordingly received, read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ROBERT PLATT.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2896) to authorize the President to appoint Acting Master Robert Platt an acting lieutenant in the Navy of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York. I ask that this bill may be considered now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It will be so referred.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

Mr. GOOCH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2897) authorizing the President to appoint George Henry Preble, now a captain on the active list of the Navy, to be a commodore; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the President to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, George Henry Preble, now a captain on the active list of the Navy, to be a commodore on the active list of the Navy, next below Commodore Edward Donaldson, being the same relative position on the Navy Register occupied by him for thirty-one years until the promotion, in 1866.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered now in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it would be unjust to make any discriminations; all these bills should first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

HENRY C. CAREY.

Mr. ORTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM B. WEST.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the bill (H. No 401) for the relief of William B. West, late

United States consul at Dublin; which was laid upon the table, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

J. & W. R. WING.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 2898) for the relief of J. & W. R. Wing, of New Bedford, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

HARRIETTE A. WOODRUFF.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2899) granting a pension to Harriette A. Woodruff, mother of Eugene A. Woodruff, late lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPHINE D. THOMAS.

Mr. RUSK also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2900) granting a pension to Josephine D. Thomas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM ROOD.

Mr. RUSK also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (S. No. 245) for the relief of William Rood, late private Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY E. NAYLOR.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

EUGENE SMITH.

Mr. SMART, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 539) granting a pension to Eugene Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN HENDRIE.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2901) granting a pension to John Hendrie, late a private in Company B, Seventeenth United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE OF VESSELS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels."

The bill was read. It provides that the provisions of the act relating to the enrollment and license of vessels navigating the western rivers and the waters on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, otherwise than by sea, approved February 28, 1865, be extended to include all vessels of the United States navigating the waters of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. The provisions of the act to which this bill refers——

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a public bill, I believe?

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will hear my explanation, I think he will not object to the consideration of the bill now. The provisions of the act to which this bill refers simply authorize the enrollment of vessels wherever they may be when their enrollment runs out, though they be in other districts than those in which they are owned. The law now makes that provision with reference to vessels on our western rivers and on the lakes; but a vessel upon the sea-coast after wintering in a particular portion of the waters of the United States must, when requiring a new enrollment in the spring, return to the district in which it is owned. This sometimes causes great delay and expense. Without an enrollment, a vessel is liable to a fine, if engaged in navigation. The Committee on Commerce recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the act referred to in the bill be read.

Mr. CONGER. I send the act to the desk. It is very short.

The SPEAKER. The right to object will be suspended until the act is read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that this is a public bill, and should be reported upon the call of the committees for public business.

The SPEAKER. The committees have been called through to-day for private business; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asks ——

Mr. CONGER. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was not present in the committee when this bill was acted on. Our only reason for asking its consideration now is that many vessels which have wintered away from the district in which they were enrolled and licensed must, under the existing law, to obtain a renewal, return to the district in which they were originally enrolled. This bill proposes to extend the existing law to vessels on our lakes and rivers, so that such vessels may be enrolled in the district where they may be at the time their enrollment runs out. It is in the interest of vessels on our Atlantic coast and in the Gulf. It is immaterial to me locally whether the House passes this bill or not; but if the act which it is proposed to extend be read, I think there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think that the gentleman had better let this bill go over, because it is an important matter and needs to be investigated.

Mr. CONGER. It is a very unimportant matter indeed, except to the owners of vessels which, under the existing law, are obliged to return to the district in which they are owned in order to obtain a new enrollment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. At any rate the bill is a very decided innovation; and my experience here is that legislation affecting our navigation interests is apt to pass through without sufficient scrutiny, thus causing complaints afterward. I do not know that this bill is liable to objection; but for one, representing a district largely interested in matters of this kind, I would like time to examine the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I only desire to say that the movement in favor of this bill comes from the gentleman's own State; and if he feels disposed to defeat the bill——

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not feel disposed to defeat the bill, but to examine it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the act to which the bill refers may be read so as to go in the RECORD, that we may understand this whole matter when the bill comes up again.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the act will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever it shall become necessary for the owner or owners of any vessel of the United States navigating the western rivers and the waters on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States otherwise than by sea, and being in a district other than that to which such vessel shall belong, to procure her enrollment and license, or license, or renewal thereof, the same proceedings may be had in the district in which the vessel then shall be, as are now or shall then be required by law on application for such enrollment and license, or license, or renewal thereof, as the case may be, in the district to which such vessel may belong, excepting the giving of bond and the enrollment and issuance of license; and the officer before whom such proceeding shall be had shall certify the same to the collector of the district to which such vessel shall belong, who shall thereupon, on the said owner or owners giving bond as required in other cases, duly enroll the said vessel and issue license in the same form as if the application had originally been made in his office; and either deliver the said license to said owner or owners or forward it by mail to the officer who certified to him the preliminary proceedings; and who shall, in such case, deliver the said license to the owner or owners or master of the vessel: Provided, That this act shall not be construed so as in any respect to change existing laws, excepting in so far as it enables such owners to procure enrollment or license, or removal thereof, without returning their vessels to their home ports or districts.

Approved February 28, 1865.

The SPEAKER. The Chair having concluded the call of committees for reports of a private nature, reports from committees of a public nature are in order during the remainder of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair understand that the objection to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce is still insisted on?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to have withdrawn his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair desires to say that when a gentleman asks unanimous consent and another gentleman distinctly objects, the Chair should not be requested to ask again if there are objections, because the presumption is that if the gentleman who has made the objection desires to withdraw it he will rise and do so, while by inadvertence he might not observe the second call of the Chair and might complain that the Chair had not given effect to his objection. The Chair does not apply this remark to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] but it is a very common habit to ask the Chair to repeat the request for objections.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Indiana being a member of the Committee on Commerce, I did not know but he might be satisfied with the explanations I had given.

Mr. HOLMAN. In objecting I simply exercised my right as a member of the House.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PACKER. I was absent when the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was called. I ask that I may be allowed to make some reports from that committee.

There was no objection.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the following bills and petitions; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and they were severally referred to the Committee on Claims:

The bill (H. R. No. 1361) for the relief of Charles W. Hatch;

The bill (H. R. No. 615) for the benefit of Philip N. Fox, of Mount Washington, Kentucky;

The bill (H. R. No. 2165) for the relief of Henry D. O'Brien, late postmaster at Saint Anthony's Falls, Minnesota;

The memorial of E. S. Zeveley;

The bill (H. R. No. 1860) for the relief of Samuel Grove, postmaster at Mexico, Missouri:

The petition of Buckman & Fogg, of New York City, contractors for carrying United States mails on route No. 6435, asking for increased allowance for such service;

The bill (H. R. No. 1278) for the relief of Mrs. Nancy Johnson, administratrix of Abraham Tipton, deceased, late postmaster at Elizabethton, Carter County, Tennessee;

The petition of Edward Hubbard, for the payment of claim for carrying United States mail;

The bill (H. R. No. 1455) for the relief J. C. Hannum, late postmaster of Delphi, Indiana;

The bill (H. R. No. 1362) for the relief of the sureties of Charles W. Hatch, late postmaster at Greensborough, Alabama; and

The bill (H. R. No. 1808) providing for the payment of the State of Georgia for carrying the United States mail in 1861.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the votes by which the above bills and petitions were severally referred to the Committee on Claims; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POSTMASTERS' SALARIES, ETC.

Mr. PACKER also, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, presented a communication from the Post-Office Department, transmitting statistics in reference to postmasters' salaries, clerks, &c., at various post-offices in the United States; and moved that the same be recommitted to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES R. YOUNG.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 470) for the relief of James R. Young; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having nearly expired, it will be considered as ended now if there be no objection, instead of proceeding with the call of committees for public reports.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that the House might take up at this point the special order and go on and finish it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] asks that the special order, which comes up at half-past one o'clock, the currency bill, may be considered as before the House now.

Mr. HOOPER. I object. Some gentlemen who expected the special order to come up at half-past one o'clock are not in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects, and the reason he has given seems to the Chair a sufficient one.

CLERICAL FORCE IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2902) to limit and regulate the clerical force in the War Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

He also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2903) to limit and regulate the clerical force in the War Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOWSTONE PUBLIC PARK.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands, for present consideration, the bill (H. R. No. 2781) entitled "A bill amendatory of and supplemental to the act entitled 'An act to set apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park,' approved March 1, 1872."

Mr. DAWES. I object.

CURRENCY.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York and the message of Governor Dix in relation to the currency. I ask to have the message of Governor Dix read, and, with the concurrent resolutions, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Several members objected to the reading of the message.

The message and the concurrent resolutions were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

AMANDA M. SMYTH.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of Amanda M. Smyth, widow of the late Brevet Major-General Thomas A. Smyth, was reported this morning from the Committee on Military Affairs and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I ask that the report of the Adjutant-General, which accompanies the report of the committee, be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE OF VESSELS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to make a privileged motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there will be no objection to the Senate bill No. 191 to amend the act in relation to the enrollment and license of vessels, if the House thinks proper to consider it at this time. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] from the Committee on Commerce, desires to have it passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well, sir; I waive my motion.

Mr. CONGER. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Commerce for consideration the bill (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels."

The bill was again read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will give some explanation of the necessity of this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I explained it just now, but the gentleman did not listen to me. The law, the provision of which is proposed to be extended, provides that on the western waters and on the lakes the owners of vessels which may be away from the place where they are owned at the time their annual enrollment expires may go before the collector of the district in which they are and get their enrollment papers for the coming year, having them sent back to the districts where they belong. That is all the provision of that law, and this bill extends it to other waters of the United States, the sea-coast, and the Gulf.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. It is provided in another law in relation to navigation that the mortgages upon vessels shall be recorded wherever the vessel is enrolled. Now, under this law is there any question as to the place of enrollment being at the home port; because there ought not to be any doubt about the mortgages being recorded at the home port, and there alone?

Mr. CONGER. I will answer the gentleman in a word. The law which I had read just now provides that when the enrollment is made in a foreign district it shall be sent at once for record to the district in which the vessel is owned, the same as if it had been executed there.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no doubt about that; but is there any possibility that the port where the act of enrollment is done may also be deemed the port of enrollment?

Mr. CONGER. The law provides that the act shall not affect any other provision of any other law except the matter of enrollment in the district where the vessel is.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This bill will take up too much time, and I must insist upon my motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question.

CURRENCY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 617, in relation to currency, so that it can be considered at the proper time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I attempted to get the ear of the Chair to ask a question of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was insisting on his motion, which is privileged.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts; and on a division there were—ayes 53, noes 89; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. MAYNARD, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 35, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE OF VESSELS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill relating to the enrollment and license of vessels. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee as objecting to its consideration?

Mr. CONGER. I understood not.

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; but I wished to ask the gentleman a question. It seemed to me that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] had made a point that we ought to consider. Suppose a vessel that is owned and has been registered, we will say at Portland, Maine, should be registered in Galveston, Texas; could any loss occur to anybody on a mortgage on that vessel before notice could be conveyed from Galveston to Portland of the enrollment at the former place? Will the gentleman explain it?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; not at all. The provisions which this bill proposes to extend provide expressly that the enrollment shall be recorded as if it were executed in the district where the vessel is owned.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. CONGER. Let me say, further, that since 1865 this law has been applicable to our western rivers and lakes, and no one has ever thought of giving any such construction to it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have never heard of any inconvenience, but it occurred to me that when a vessel goes three or four thousand miles from the place where its enrollment is recorded, it might give dishonest persons an opportunity to do wrong.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Take the case suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] of a vessel owned in Maine which goes to Galveston and is there enrolled. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] says that the law provides that the papers shall be sent to Maine and be there recorded. What will be actually done in Galveston? Will not the papers be recorded there also?

Mr. CONGER. Not at all. The law merely provides that the papers shall be executed before a certain officer.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman is satisfied of that?

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not want that there shall be a double enrollment. The gentleman is as much interested as I am in protecting the rights of owners of vessels. I ask him to guard the bill carefully and see that there is no possibility of wrong. Undoubtedly the enrollment will be at the home port; let the gentleman see that it cannot be anywhere else besides.

Mr. CONGER. Those who framed the law, in order to guard against any possibility of misconstruction, added a proviso so that it should not effect any other purpose except to enable the owner of the vessel to get his enrollment executed in another district.

Mr. MAYNARD. One question more. I am not personally acquainted with the technical operation of these laws at all, but, as I understand it, the vessel will not be enrolled at Portland for instance, but the enrollment will be made out before officers at Galveston, and recorded in Portland.

Mr. CONGER. I think there can be no question about that. I now call for a vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think we had better have a division on that vote.

Mr. CONGER. I tell the gentleman that I will not be the butt of any one merely for the purpose of killing time. I apprehend the gentleman can kill time in some other way.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw my call for a division on the question.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IRON-SHIP-BUILDING YARDS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. ARCHER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to transmit to this House a copy of the report of Chief Engineer William H. Shock, of the United States Navy, relative to iron-ship-building yards of Great Britain.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SYSTEMS.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 2904) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 911) to relinquish title of the United States in certain real estate near Columbia, Tennessee, to Rose Hill Cemetery;

An act (H. R. No. 912) to provide for the inspection of the disbursements of appropriations made by officers of the Army; and

An act (H. R. No. 2124) authorizing the changing of the name of the steamer Fannie Lehr.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, was granted leave of absence until the 22d instant.

Mr. ASHE was granted leave of absence for two weeks.

POSTAL RAILWAY SERVICE.

Mr. PACKARD asked unanimous consent to have printed for the use of the House the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Transportation relating to railway postal service, that committee having in an informal manner communicated the testimony to the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. AVERILL asked that leave be granted to the Committee on Indian Affairs to sit during the sessions of the House for the purpose of prosecuting certain investigations ordered by the House.

No objection was made; and leave was accordingly granted.

GEORGE A. ARMES.

Mr. MOREY. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs Senate bill No. 249, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give to George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry, an honorable discharge to date June 7, 1870.

No objection was made; and the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LIGHT-SHIP IN DETROIT RIVER.

Mr. BASS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and adopted:

Whereas navigation upon the great lakes is endangered by submerged bowlders near the mouth of the Detroit River in Lake Erie, and serious losses of property have occurred at that point: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of maintaining a light-ship at or near the mouth of said river.

OSAGE INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. LOWE. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, for consideration now, a bill to extend the time for completing entries of Osage Indian lands in Kansas.

The bill was read. It provides that all actual settlers upon the Osage Indian trust and diminished reserve lands in the State of Kansas shall be allowed one year from the passage of the act in which to make proof and payment; provided that all purchasers who avail themselves of the provisions of the act shall pay the interest on the purchase price of their lands at the rate of 5 per cent. from the date when payment was required by previous laws to the date of actual payment.

Mr. LOWE. This bill merely grants an extension of time to one year. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. Does the bill affect the rights of adverse claimants?

Mr. LOWE. Not at all; it does not interfere with anybody's rights; it merely grants an extension of time.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I wish to ask the gentleman what effect the passage of this bill will have upon the interest that is due the Osage Indians for these lands?

Mr. LOWE. The bill provides that the interest shall be paid. The measure is approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and is unanimously reported by the committee. It makes no deduction from the funds of the Indians, but provides for the payment of their interest in the same way as other funds.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the bill.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I give notice that on Monday next, if I can obtain the floor, I shall ask the House to take from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole and act in the House upon the bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in regard to the prosecution of work on public buildings.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing for a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday evening when I moved the previous question upon this bill, several gentlemen had requested that they might offer amendments. I, however, desired to test the sense of the House upon the bill as it now stands. I trust, however, there will be no objection to allowing these several propositions to appear in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the gentleman from Tennessee the right to indicate that certain gentlemen may offer amendments and that others, including myself, shall not do so?

The SPEAKER. He has no such right.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will allow a proposition to be submitted to the House to determine whether the increase of currency demanded by the country shall be in the form of United States notes—greenbacks. The gentleman certainly should permit the House to vote upon that question. For one, while I favor an increase of currency, I insist that this increase of currency should be in United States notes, the lawful money of the country, and not in the form of national-bank currency for the benefit of the banks.

Mr. KASSON. I request the gentleman from Tennessee to allow me to ask a question.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is in the nature of debate; I cannot yield. It seems to me we have had sufficient debate upon this question. If I yield to one gentleman to ask one question, I must yield to somebody else to ask another question. Without wishing to do anything ungenerous or unkind, I renew my demand for the previous question.

Mr. HUNTER. I trust the gentleman will permit me to say that, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I am perfectly satisfied with the bill of the committee so far as it goes, but on the 27th of last month, when I had the honor of addressing the House, I gave notice that when this bill came up I should offer certain amendments. I had an agreement with the chairman of the committee that I should offer those amendments; but he now declines to permit any further amendments. I therefore desire that those amendments may be published in the RECORD.

Several MEMBERS. No objection.

Mr. HUNTER. My amendment is in two sections. One designed to prevent usury by national banks, and the other to allow greenbacks and national-bank notes to be taxed in the States and Territories in the same way as money.

[Mr. HUNTER's amendment, being subsequently offered and voted upon, will be found in its appropriate place.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no objection to the printing in the RECORD of any amendments that gentlemen may desire to publish.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood that all amendments which members may send to the reporters' desk will be published in the RECORD.

In pursuance of this arrangement the following amendments are published:

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Add to section 2 the following:

Provided, That no interest shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, after the passage of this act, on the bonds which have been or shall be deposited in the Treasury to secure the circulation of any banking association, except on the excess of the market value of such bonds, over the average circulation of such association during the current year, while such bonds shall remain on deposit in the Treasury to secure such circulation.

Add the following as new sections:

SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, from and after the passage of this act, whenever any notes issued to any national bank, in virtue and by authority of the provisions of the national-currency act, approved June 3, 1864, or by any act amendatory thereof, shall be paid into the Treasury for taxes, excises, public lands, or other dues to the United States, or on any other account or for any other purpose whatever, and the said notes so coming into the Treasury shall be so defaced, torn, mutilated, worn, or ragged, as to be unfit for circulation, instead of returning them to the national bank by which they were issued, to return to said national-bank notes of an equal amount in value, issued by the United States and known as legal-tender notes.

SEC. —. That whenever the sum of legal-tender notes so issued in lieu of said defaced, torn, mutilated, worn, or ragged notes of any national bank shall amount to 90 per cent. of the face value of any bond of the United States deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury as security for the circulation issued by said bank, the Secretary of the Treasury shall surrender and deliver up to said national bank one of said bonds, and so on until the whole of the notes authorized by the national-currency act aforesaid shall be withdrawn from circulation.

SEC. — That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue fifty millions of legal-tenders, of the same denominations as now authorized by law, which shall be used for the purposes of said substitution and for no other purpose whatsoever.

By Mr. COTTON:

Amend section 3, line 31, by striking out the words "four hundred" and inserting "three hundred and eighty-two;" so that the last proviso of the section will read as follows:

And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

By Mr. FIELD:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, from time to time, on demand, in exchange at par for legal-tender notes, the bonds of the United States in denominations of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, said bonds to bear interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, and principal and interest payable on demand in legal-tender notes of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to redeem said bonds on demand at the United States Treasury, at the offices of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and at such other convenient places within the United States as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate for the purpose, and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and whenever said bonds shall be presented for payment, and paid as aforesaid, the same shall be immediately canceled, and stamped with the date of payment and the word "paid" on the face thereof, and the same shall be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall monthly cause the bonds so paid to be destroyed in the presence of the Treasurer of the United States and the Register of the Treasury, of which destruction a memorandum or record shall be made, showing the date, denomination, number, and date of payment of each bond, in a book to be provided for that purpose, and signed by the officers aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, in exchange for Government bonds or in payment of demands on the Treasury, any part of the $44,000,000 of United States legal-tender notes called greenbacks, and commonly designated "the reserve," and such further sum of said legal-tender notes as may be required to carry into effect the provisions of this act, of such amounts as he may deem expedient, not less than one dollar each; which legal-tender notes, as well as all legal-tender notes heretofore issued, shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, and for all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatever, except where the law creating such claim or demand requires that the same shall be paid in coin, and shall be lawful money and legal tender in payment of all public and private debts, except as aforesaid, within the United States, and shall be receivable in payment of all loans made to the United States. Said notes shall be in the similitude of the legal-tender greenback currency notes heretofore issued, except that they shall bear on their face the denomination or value for which they are money, and the words "convertible at the option of the holder to United States bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum," together with appropriate vignettes to prevent counterfeiting, and such signatures, checks, and numbers, or other references as may be best to prevent overissue or forgeries, and on the back thereof shall be printed the provisions of law under which they are issued.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to apply the amount of the legal-tender notes received in exchange for the bonds authorized by the first section of this act, to the extent that may be required for the purpose, in the redemption of such of the said three sixty-five convertible bonds as may be presented for payment, and the residue of said legal-tender notes, received in exchange for bonds as aforesaid, in the redemption or purchase weekly of the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States known as five-twenty bonds, each and every week after the passage of this act, until the entire issue of said 6 per cent. bonds shall have been redeemed and paid.

SEC. 5. That after the 30th day of June, 1874, the national banking associations shall cease to be banks of issue; and that all taxes on their circulation shall thereafter cease. And the Comptroller of the Currency shall, from the date aforesaid, charge to each national bank interest semi-annually, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, in coin, on the amount of their bills outstanding and unredeemed; and he shall deduct the amount thereof from the amount of the interest payable by the United States to such bank on the United States registered bonds lodged to secure the redemption of its circulating notes; and the Comptroller shall continue half-yearly to charge and collect interest as aforesaid until such national bank shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States lawful money of the United States sufficient to redeem all its outstanding circulation; and thereafter the notes of such national bank shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States as by law provided.

SEC. 6. That section 5 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, and section 6 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 7. That the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

By Mr. HOLMAN:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rules and regulations requiring the several national banking associations and their redeeming agencies to forward to the Treasury of the United States for cancellation all worn and mutilated bank-notes; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the same to be canceled and destroyed. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be canceled and destroyed all such notes of the national banking associations as may come into the Treasury; and he shall, from time to time, in lieu of such notes so canceled, issue United States notes of like denominations with the notes so canceled, which United States notes shall be of like tenor and effect, and in like manner lawful money and legal tender, with the United States notes now authorized by law; and such United States notes shall be covered into the Treasury, and applied, with other moneys in the Treasury, toward the liquidation of the national debt.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time to deliver to each of said national banking associations an amount of the bonds deposited in the Treasury to secure the circulation of such banking association equal to the par value of the notes canceled and destroyed under the provisions of this act. And all laws or parts of laws requiring such banking associations to keep on deposit a reserve of United States notes are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. An annual tax of 3 per cent. is hereby assessed on all bonds which have been or shall be deposited in the Treasury by banking associations to secure their circulation, which shall be deducted from the interest annually accruing on such bonds.

SEC. 4. All laws and parts of laws exempting United States notes from State and other local taxation are hereby repealed, and such notes shall be subject to the same taxation as other money is or shall be by virtue of the laws of the several States.

By Mr. PENDLETON:

At the end of section 2 add the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to fund United States notes, known as legal-tenders, into 5 per cent. bonds to an amount equal to three-fourths of the amount of the increase of the national-bank circulation, and shall cancel and destroy said United States notes.

By Mr. VANCE:

At the end of section 3 add the following:

Provided, That associations now organized, or that may be organized, under said act shall not be allowed to pay interest on deposits, and a violation of this provision shall work a forfeiture of the charter of such associations.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to withdraw from circulation and cancel, under proper regulations, all national-bank notes which may be received by the Treasury for dues and taxes or which may be tendered for exchange into Treasury notes, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to have duly prepared Treasury notes, payable on demand to bearer, for like amounts with the national notes which may be withdrawn and canceled as directed by the first section of this act, and which he shall issue, pay out, and exchange in lieu of and for said national-bank notes.

SEC. 3. That all Treasury notes issued heretofore, and under authority of this act, may and shall be receivable in payment of customs dues to the extent of 50 per cent. of such dues as the same are payable.

SEC. 4. That all existing laws which require a reserve to be kept by the national banks be, and the same are hereby, repealed.]

Mr. BECK. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question of fact, which will determine my vote.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is a matter of debate, and I cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question. On this question the Chair orders tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MAYNARD, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BECK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 69.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. RANDALL. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 120, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Ashe, Averill, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Farwell, Fort, Freeman, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Harrison, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Sloan, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodford—57.

So the House refused to order the main question.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CALDWELL. My colleague, Mr. BROMBERG, has been temporarily called from the House. If he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. COBURN. My colleague, Mr. SAYLER, is paired with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. If he were here he would vote "ay," and Mr. TOWNSEND would vote "no."

Mr. MITCHELL. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ELDREDGE. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. O'BRIEN. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is detained from the House by sickness in his family. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. KNAPP. Mr. NEGLEY, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. LAMISON, of Ohio, are paired. If present Mr. NEGLEY would vote "ay," and Mr. LAMISON "no."

Mr. CLYMER. My colleague, Mr. MAGEE, is still absent. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My colleague, Mr. HERSEY, is still detained from the House by ill health. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to announce that Mr. CROCKER, of Massachusetts, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. If here Mr. CROCKER would vote "no," and Mr. SMITH would vote "ay."

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. STRAIT, is absent on account of sickness. If he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. LAWSON. My colleague, Mr. WOODFORD, is absent on account of sickness in his family. If he were present he would vote "no."

Mr. BRADLEY. My colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, has been unexpectedly called away. If he were present he would vote "no."

Mr. LYNCH. I am paired with Mr. ELLIOTT, of South Carolina. If he were present he would vote against the bill and I would vote for it.

Mr. PIKE. My colleague, Mr. SMALL, is still at home. If he were present he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof what I send to the desk. It is House bill No. 2740.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has it been printed?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is printer's No. 2774. There is a written section at the end which is not in the printed bill, numbered section 13. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to include that in his amendment.

Mr. BECK. I do. It makes half the duties on imports payable in United States notes.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue, in manner as hereinafter prescribed, on the faith and credit of the Government, $400,000,000 of Treasury notes, payable on demand in United States legal-tender notes, at the Treasury and at such United States depositories as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate. Said notes shall be similar in form and appearance to the said legal-tender notes, and may be of denominations not less than one dollar nor more than $10,000, and shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, claims, and demands due to the United States and of all claims and demands against the United States, to the same extent that national-bank notes are receivable and no further.

SEC. 2. That the Treasury notes authorized herein to be issued shall only be issued to the extent that national-bank notes shall be returned by national banks for cancellation and destruction, as provided in section 9 of this act, and shall only be used in the purchase of the United States bonds commonly called five-twenties.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue from time to time, on demand, in exchange at par for legal-tender notes of the United States, the bonds of the United States in denominations of fifty dollars or any multiple thereof; said bonds to be called United States convertible bonds, to bear interest at the rate 3.65 per cent. per annum, and principal and interest payable on demand in legal-tender notes of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to redeem said bonds on demand at the Treasury of the United States, at the offices of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and at such other convenient places within the United States as he may designate for that purpose, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and whenever said bonds are presented and paid as aforesaid, the same shall be immediately canceled and stamped with the word "paid" on the face thereof, and the same shall be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, monthly, cause the bonds so paid to be destroyed in the presence of the Treasurer of the United States and Register of the Treasury, of which destruction a record shall be made showing the date, denomination, number, and date of payment of each bond, in a book to be provided for that purpose, and signed by the officers aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That the $50,000,000 of legal-tender United States notes, authorized by existing laws to be issued in addition to the $400,000,000 contemplated for permanent circulation, shall be prepared and held as a reserve for the redemption and payment of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by section 1 and of the convertible bonds authorized to be issued by section 3 of this act.

SEC. 6. That the money received in exchange for convertible bonds shall only be used in the purchase of the bonds of the United States called five-twenties, and in keeping a reserve for the payment of the principal and interest of the convertible bonds when demanded, which reserve shall be of such an amount as, in addition to the $50,000,000 mentioned in section 5 of this act, shall be sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary, to insure their prompt redemption. Whenever any portion of said $50,000,000 shall have been used in the redemption of Treasury notes or convertible bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell to the highest bidder, for United States legal-tender notes, any of the bonds now authorized by law to be issued for funding the public debt, to an amount sufficient to restore to the Treasury all of said $50,000,000 that shall have been used as aforesaid. Such sale of bonds shall be made upon due notice by advertisement and upon biddings made by sealed proposals.

SEC. 7. That all further issue of national-bank notes to national banks by the Comptroller of the Currency, whether for the renewal of defaced and torn bank-notes or for any other purpose, is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 8. That in lieu of the tax of 1 per cent. per annum now imposed by law on the outstanding circulation of national banks, a tax of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually in gold, shall be collected upon the circulation which has been issued to each national bank which has not been returned for cancellation. This tax shall be collected by withholding one-half of said tax semi-annually from the semi-annual interest upon the registered bonds deposited by said banks as security for their circulation; and if the interest of said registered bonds is payable in currency, there shall be retained of said currency the equivalent of said tax at the market premium on gold, which premium shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 9. That each national bank may withdraw any part of its United States registered bonds deposited as security for the redemption of its circulation by paying into the proper department of the Treasury $900 of its circulation for each $1,000 of bonds so withdrawn, and may withdraw all of said registered bonds by paying a sum equal to its whole circulation, in its own bank-notes, and United States legal-tender notes, or wholly in either of them; and thereupon the United States shall be bound to redeem, on demand, the whole of such circulation of said bank which shall be outstanding. When such circulation is redeemed or paid into the Treasury as provided herein, it shall be destroyed in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 10. That the United States legal-tender notes paid into the Treasury under the provisions of section 9 shall only be used, first, for redeeming the circulation for which it was paid into the Treasury, for doing which promptly a sufficient reserve shall be kept in aid of the fund provided in section 5; and, secondly, in purchasing United States five-twenty bonds.

SEC. 11. That whenever the Secretary of the Treasury may think it expedient, he may use any coin in the Treasury not required for the payment of demands against the United States payable in coin, in redeeming any United States five-twenty bonds that have become payable at the pleasure of the Government, the market value of which coin, as fixed by said Secretary, shall be substituted by Treasury notes issued by authority of this act, or by legal-tender notes received under the authority of this act, which shall thereupon become subject to be used in the Treasury for the payment of all claims and demands against the United States.

SEC. 12. That no purchases of United States five-twenty bonds shall be made under the provisions of section 2 or sections 6 and 10 of this act when the price demanded shall be at a greater rate of premium upon the bonds than 10 per cent. above their par value of principal and accrued interest; nor shall any redemption of said bonds be made in pursuance of section 11 while the premium on gold is above 10 per cent. in lawful money.

SEC. 13. That hereafter one-half of all duties on imports may be paid in legal-tender notes of the United States, or in any other currency authorized to be issued by the Congress of the United States, instead of in gold, as now required by law.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to amend the text of the original bill. It is an amendment to the third section, and I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 29 and 30 of section 3 the words "outstanding and in circulation at any one time," and insert the words "which shall be issued permanently;" and also insert after the word "law," in the thirty-second line, the words "and for the purposes of a reserve;" so that the proviso shall read as follows:

That the entire amount of United States notes which shall be permanently issued shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000 now authorized by existing law; and, for the purposes of a reserve, that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue the sum of $50,000,000 of United States notes, in excess of the sum of $400,000,000 hereinbefore authorized to be issued, in any of the denominations now authorized by law, which he shall hold, to be exchanged on demand of the holder for an equivalent amount at their par value of United States bonds, which bonds shall be by said Secretary placed in the Treasury of the United States, to be delivered to the person so exchanging them at any time within twelve months from that date; and, after the expiration of that time, to be delivered to any citizen of the United States presenting an equivalent amount of said United States notes; and thereafter the said notes shall be held for like exchange upon demand and the deposit of like bonds as hereinbefore provided. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retain the interest which may accrue upon said bonds while on deposit as aforesaid in the Treasury before delivering them in exchange for United States notes.

Mr. HUNTER. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as two additional sections to the original bill.

Mr. SPEER. I ask to have the twenty-ninth rule of the House read before the voting begins.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested, or in any case where he was not within the bar of the House when the question was put.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] offers an amendment in the nature of two additional sections to the original bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to raise the point of order on the amendment presented by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] that it proposes to change the customs laws and should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first read the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUNTER.]

Mr. COX. I rise to almost a personal point. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] has had read the rule in reference to the right to vote of those who are interested, and I desire to raise the point of order distinctly. I hope to offer an amendment to that of the gentleman from Kentucky, amending his bill so as to leave the eighth section taxing the banks——

Mr. COBURN. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New York speaking to the point he raises?

Mr. COX. I propose to tax the banks, and I own bank-stock. I am therefore interested. How can I vote under that rule? I propose to vote to tax myself.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has any conscientious scruples on the subject the House will not force him to vote.

Mr. FORT. Let the gentleman assign his bank-stock to me and I will not vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled on this point heretofore.

Mr. COX. The Chair cannot make a joke of it, because the point comes down to this: members are interested on both sides. I choose to vote against my own interests.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled on this point. The gentleman from New York knows very well that the Chair does not rule on abstract questions. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had the rule read which says that no member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is interested.

Mr. SPEER. I did not ask a ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand. The gentleman from New York will observe that when a point of that kind is made it cannot be raised generally. Some specific member must be named who has an interest in the question to be decided. The gentleman has named himself, and the Chair declines to rule upon the point, but leaves it wholly to the conscience of the gentleman.

Mr. COX. But, Mr. Speaker, this is entirely too important a matter to be made a pleasantry.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] well knows, or ought to know, that in the last Congress, when the occasion was one of great public importance, the Chair distinctly gave his opinion upon this question. The Chair does not think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any point of order before the House at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; but the gentleman from New York seems to insist upon having it before the House.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] raised the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania distinctly denied raising any point of order.

Mr. COX. He read the rule to us.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had the rule read, which he or any other member had a right to have read at any time. But a point of order cannot be raised against 292 members. The Chair declines to rule, unless the point of order is raised upon some member specified by name. If, at the time when the point of order can be raised, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will raise it and specify himself, the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I recollect the decision of the Chair made in the last Congress in relation to bank stock, and members holding that stock. I also recollect a decision which was made subsequently by the Chair in relation to Pacific Railroad stock, and the right of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] to vote upon a question affecting that stock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made this distinction at the time, based upon a decision made by Mr. Speaker Winthrop in the house of representatives in the State of Massachusetts, in which decision the doctrine is somewhat fully set forth, and which the Chair does nothing more than concur in. The point was made in the Legislature of Massachusetts, about 1833 or 1834, if the Chair remembers correctly, that a member who owned some manufacturing stock in that State could not vote upon a question of general law regulating manufactures in that State. The point of order was overruled upon the ground that that was a general interest permeating the whole people of the State, and was not a distinct and personal interest separate and distinct from the public weal. Now in the case of a specific single corporation by name, coming in here and having legislation to affect its rights, and a member representing in his own person the interest of that corporation, the Chair presumes that that member would be regarded as very differently situated from one owning shares of national-bank stock, that stock being diffused throughout the whole country, interlaced with all the business of the country, and upon which the currency and business of the country are based. That is not a distinct, personal, peculiar, private interest separate and apart from public interest. The Chair thinks the distinction is perfectly obvious, and it is one upon which he will stand.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MAYNARD. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry is always in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The decision of the Chair can be appealed from when made at the proper time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not allow an appeal to be made from a decision of a general conversational nature. But if the point of order is raised on some particular individual member, the Chair will rule upon it, and that decision can be appealed from.

Mr. SPEER. Can the point of order be made during the roll-call?

The SPEAKER. It had better be made in advance of the roll-call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I now raise the point of order against the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and I do so in all kindness, for the purpose of having it tested.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very glad to have his decision appealed from, and determined by the House.

Mr. SPEER. I do not see how we can have a point of order ruled upon in advance of knowing how the gentleman would vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My point of order is that the gentleman from New York has no right to vote upon the question either way.

Mr. COX. I propose to vote to tax the bank in which I am interested; and I am the one to make the point upon myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the reading of the amendment proposed to the original bill by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUNTER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When will the Speaker entertain the point of order against the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the point of order when the yeas and nays have been ordered to be called upon a particular amendment involving the point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. COX. If I propose to vote against my own interest, will the Chair rule that I have no right to vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell what would be the gentleman's interest. It might introduce into the House the question of bulling and bearing of stocks.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have offered an amendment to the text of the original bill. Is any amendment in order except to the amendment I have offered?

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman's colleague [Mr. HUNTER] is in the nature of an amendment to an amendment. It is admitted on that ground, although it applies to a different portion of the bill. But two amendments can be entertained and be pending at the same time.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will it be in order to move to recommit this bill with instructions?

The SPEAKER. That would depend on whether the gentleman in charge of the bill or any one of the gentlemen who have offered amendments shall demand the previous question. They would have the prior right to the floor. If the previous question were not demanded, the motion indicated by the gentleman would be in order and would be entertained by the Chair.

Mr. BURCHARD. I understand the point of order is not waived, but will be ruled upon by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BECK. I call the previous question on the amendments now pending.

The SPEAKER. As soon as the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] is read the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky for that motion.

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. HUNTER, as follows:

Add to the bill of the committee the following, as new sections:

SEC. —. That no national bank shall hereafter take, receive, reserve, or charge, on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, a greater interest than the rate allowed by the laws of the State or Territory where the bank is located, which shall in no case exceed 10 per cent. per annum; and every contract knowingly made by any officer or officers of a national bank, where the amount received by or to be paid to said bank, or for its use or benefit, either directly or indirectly in the shape of interest, discount, premium, profit, or remuneration of any kind, for the use of its money, where such sum so received or to be paid shall be greater than the amount of interest or discount allowed to betaken by such bank upon any loan or discount made by it, such contract shall be deemed usurious and shall be absolutely null and void, and all money paid thereon shall be recoverable back by the party or parties who paid the same, or by his, her, or their heirs or legal representatives in case of his, her, or their death by suit at law, in any court having competent jurisdiction, providing the suit shall be brought within six years from such payment, and the officer or officers of such bank who made, or advised to be made, such contract shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States, within the State or Territory where said bank shall be situated having jurisdiction of such cases, shall be fined in any sum not less than $100, to which may be added imprisonment in the penitentiary for any period of time not exceeding one year, within the discretion of the court or jury trying the case; and every direct or indirect means used by any bank or its officers to evade the provisions of this section by using the money of the bank in any other manner than in bona fide loans or discounts by the bank, as provided in this section, shall be prima facie evidence of usury, and the officer or officers so committing usury shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished as provided in this section for punishing misdemeanors. The words "bona fide loans or discounts," as used in this section, shall be construed to mean only such loans or discounts in which the bank parts with its entire interest in the money so used by it or its officers in making such loan or discount, without any understanding, hope, or expectation of receiving any benefit therefrom, directly or indirectly, except the note, draft, bill of exchange, or thing of value received in exchange by the bank for such loan or discount. And it is hereby made the special duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to see that every officer of any such banks who shall be guilty of a violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be prosecuted and punished as above provided; and if such Comptroller shall fail to have prosecuted all officers of banks whose violations of the provisions of this section shall come to his knowledge within a reasonable time thereafter, he shall himself be subject to like punishment with the officer or officers so offending as an accessory after the fact; and upon the failure of such Comptroller to promptly put into full force the provisions of this section against all bank officers who shall violate the same, in addition to the punishment above provided for him, he shall be dismissed from office by the President of the United States, but such dismissal from office shall in no-wise prevent or extenuate his punishment as above provided.

SEC. —. That hereafter all United States notes commonly called greenbacks, and all national-bank notes, shall be taxable within the States and Territories the same as money is therein, and not otherwise.

Mr. PACKER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting what I send to the desk.

Mr. BECK. Was not I recognized to call the previous question? I rose as soon as the Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. The Chair had told me that he would recognize me to call the previous question after the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana had been read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I propose to amend by offering as a substitute the Senate bill.

Mr. BECK. We have the Senate bill now in another and better form. I want to hold that in reserve.

Mr. PACKER. The gentleman from Kentucky yielded to have an amendment read. I then offered my amendment, which is in the second degree, and is, I submit, in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is somewhat in doubt whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] should be recognized. The gentleman from Kentucky had indicated his intention publicly on the floor to call the previous question after the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] had been read.

Mr. BECK. On the amendments then pending.

Mr. PACKER. That may be true; but still the gentleman has no right by saying that he intends to call the previous question to prevent other members from exercising their parliamentary rights.

Mr. COX. That is the very thing the gentleman from Kentucky has complained of in regard to the gentleman from Tennessee. I wish to offer an amendment to the gentleman's substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] claimed the floor and offered his amendment at a time when no other gentleman was seeking it. The attention of the gentleman from Kentucky seemed to be diverted in another direction.

Mr. BECK. I was simply waiting for the Clerk to conclude the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUNTER,] the Chair having told me that I would then be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was looking toward the gentleman from Kentucky when the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose. The gentleman from Pennsylvania wishes to offer a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky. To entertain the proposition will not deprive the gentleman from Kentucky of any rights, but only accord a privilege to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Therefore the Chair will consider the proposition as pending.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. PACKER, offered as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. BECK, as follows:

That so much of the twenty-second section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and so much of such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of said act shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States upon the terms and conditions, and subject to all the limitations and restrictions, now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That after notes for circulation shall have been issued, under the provisions of the preceding section and of the several acts of Congress therein referred to, to national banking associations to the aggregate amount or sum of $400,000,000, the Comptroller of the Currency shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury, at the end of each month thereafter, the amount of notes for circulation issued to national banking associations, in addition to said sum of $400,000,000, during the said month, and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be redeemed, retired, and canceled, an amount of United States legal-tender notes equal to said additional amount of notes for circulation so issued to such national banking associations as aforesaid, until the whole amount or volume of United States legal-tender notes shall be reduced to the sum of $250,000,000.

Mr. BECK. I now demand the previous question upon the pending amendments.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question should be refused on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] would it be in order then to move the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments?

The SPEAKER. On the bill and pending amendments?

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will say, then, to the House that if they refuse to second the demand for the previous question, as made by the gentleman from Kentucky, on the amendments, I will then move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. It is, of course, a matter for the House to decide.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he would allow me to move to amend his substitute by striking out all but the eighth section, taxing the banks, and the thirteenth section?

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. Could not the gentleman from Kentucky consent to it?

Mr. BECK. I would not object to the gentleman offering that amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it the proper time now to make a point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is pending, and would be ruled upon when the House reaches a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to make a point of order also on the eighth section, which raises taxes, and should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICE. I desire to ask the Chair if it is not in order to make a motion to postpone this matter?

The SPEAKER. It would be if the gentleman had the floor for that purpose.

Mr. RICE. Then I wish I had it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Chair whether the point of order should not be ruled upon now; because the House might vote differently on ordering the previous question on the amendments if they supposed that of the gentleman from Kentucky was in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair conceives that the gentleman from Massachusetts states the very reason why the Chair should not announce the point of order. The Chair should not announce points of order to influence votes in advance of the time when they can properly be made.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But the Chair has ruled that all the amendments that could properly be proposed to the bill now have been made. We cannot offer another now. And how can the Chair keep out other amendments without determining whether this first amendment is subject to the point of order?

Mr. PACKER. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Immediately on the finishing of the reading of my amendment I called the previous question on the amendments and the bill. Is not that the first question to be voted on?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, under the circumstances, it is rather his duty to recognize the gentleman from Kentucky; but the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] is all comprehended in the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] It is for the House to decide between the two. Had the Chair recognized the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Kentucky could have asked that the previous question should be simply on the amendment, and then it would have been for the majority to decide, just as it now is. If the House refuses to second the demand for the previous question on the amendments, then the question comes up, will it second the demand for the previous question on the bill and amendments; so that it is all within the power of the majority.

Mr. PACKER. How can I have the advantage of the previous question on my amendment?

The SPEAKER. It operates directly on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PACKER. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky merely wants the previous question on his amendment.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. He calls the previous question on all the amendments, including that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICE. If the previous question is not sustained, will I have an opportunity to move the postponement?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not sustained, the Chair will recognize the gentleman who has charge of the bill. If his motion does not prevail, the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICE.]

Mr. PACKER. Would not the effect of that be that my amendment would be dropped?

The SPEAKER. Not at all; it cannot be. The previous question will operate on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PACKER. Yes; but if the demand for the previous question is not sustained on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, what then?

The SPEAKER. The only difference is this: the gentleman from Kentucky asks the previous question on the amendments.

Mr. PACKER. On his amendment?

The SPEAKER. On all four, including that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The operation of the previous question would be exhausted when the amendments were disposed of, leaving the bill open to further amendments. To that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] objects and desires the previous question to be on the bill and amendments, the difference being that after the amendments were disposed of the House would proceed to dispose of the bill without its being open to further amendments. But nothing can prevent the House from voting on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER.]

Mr. MELLISH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not the right of the House to know whether the amendment is in order before voting on it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the force of what was urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] was that the thirteenth section of the amendment moved by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] changes the customs law on every imported article.

Mr. BURCHARD. I refer particularly to Rules 110 and 111.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not decide the question on that ground. The Chair would decide it on the ground that it is not germane. This is a bill in relation to fixing the currency, and the Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken as against the thirteenth section as not being germane.

Mr. BECK. Is not the point of order made too late after amendments have been offered to the amendment?

Mr. DAWES. It was raised when the amendment was first offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, if he desires to offer his substitute without that section in it.

Mr. BECK. Very well; I will strike out section 13.

The SPEAKER. The point of order which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] made against that portion of the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, taxing bank stock, the Chair does not think well taken.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has not the ruling always been that a tax or an increase of taxation must always be considered in Committee of the Whole, and when such a bill comes from the Committee of the Whole, can there be an increase of tax in the House without the bill going back to the Committee of the Whole? Must not an increase of taxation be first considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. But the House agreed to consider this bill in the House as if in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLOGG. Ah! but that was a bill in relation to the currency, and not for raising revenue by either customs or internal revenue.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that an amendment regulating the taxation of the very currency that the bill is creating is a very different thing from one affecting the tariff laws on every article imported. The section of the amendment to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] excepted would have changed the import duties on every article imported into the country, and therefore was not germane to this bill. The Chair did not rule it out on the ground that it was a tax; but that it was not germane to a bill regulating the currency. But the Chair does not think that an amendment proposing to vary the tax on currency, currency being the very thing and the only thing under consideration, is on the same ground, and therefore he will not rule out this section.

Mr. KELLOGG. Allow me to say one thing. This amendment not only taxes the currency raised by this bill, but the currency established for ten years past.

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. KELLOGG. It taxes at 1½ per cent. the interest on the bonds.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now I submit that no ruling of the House has ever gone beyond this point, that a bill taxing the national-bank circulation simply for the purpose of meeting the expenses of issuing that circulation does not come within the objection. That is as far as the ruling of the Chair has ever gone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not take the force of the fact that this bill was originally in Committee of the Whole, but by a suspension of the rules was brought before the House for consideration as in Committee of the Whole. Does the gentleman recognize that fact?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly; but that was a bill in reference to currency, not a bill raising taxes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please hear the Chair. The bill was in Committee of the Whole. Now, if the bill had remained in Committee of the Whole, there is no doubt whatever that this amendment would have been germane and in order. The House, however, agreed to consider this bill in the House under precisely the same limitations and restrictions that it would have in Committee of the Whole, and therefore the Chair rules, as he thinks, on logic that is irresistible, that whatever would be in order as an amendment to the bill in Committee of the Whole is in order here. If the Chair had been presiding as chairman of the Committee of the Whole he would have ruled that the thirteenth section in Committee of the Whole was not germane; but he would not have ruled it out on the ground that it imposed a tax. Any amendment to the bill that could be entertained in Committee of the Whole was transferred to the House when the House agreed to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLOGG. I submit, with all deference of course, to the ruling of the Chair; we are powerless here; but I desire to say one word. Was not the bill in Committee of the Whole simply a bill to regulate the volume of the currency?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman is asking questions the Chair begs leave to ask questions in turn. Would the gentleman hold in Committee of the Whole that this amendment was not in order?

Mr. KELLOGG. Not an amendment raising the tax.

The SPEAKER. Would not the amendment be in order if the bill were in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. KELLOGG. Was not the action of the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, I will answer that it would not have been in order.

The SPEAKER. There is where the gentleman and the Chair differ. We differ as to its being in order in Committee of the Whole, and if in order in Committee of the Whole, it must necessarily be in order here, because the House in transferring the bill to the House for consideration, did not take off any of the power that would have been in Committee of the Whole; none whatever.

Mr. COX. What was the ruling of the Chair in relation to the thirteenth section?

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to call the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] to this: That the bill is a bill "to amend the several acts providing for a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes;" the bill being therefore an amendment to the several acts for the organization of national banks, all the provisions that were embraced in those acts, including the provision for taxation, are fairly open to amendment in the House. It brings up every one of the preceding acts, and makes any amendment that would be germane to any provision of those acts in order as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. The point of order I made was that there was no provision in the original bill imposing a tax on banks.

The SPEAKER. But the House, if it chooses to do so, may adopt a provision increasing the tax on banks.

Mr. COX. The Chair has ruled out the thirteenth section of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] as I understand.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. COX. On the same ground that the Chair ruled in the eighth section?

The SPEAKER. On an entirely different ground. The Chair ruled out the thirteenth section on the ground that this is not a bill regulating duties on imports, and therefore the thirteenth section is not germane.

Mr. COX. Then I would ask the Chair why it is that, during the last four or five years, every bill introduced in this House in reference to the payment of customs dues partly in greenbacks has always been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and not to the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. That is not a point upon which the Chair has to rule. The point now is between the two motions of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] The gentleman from Kentucky moves the previous question upon the pending amendments to this bill. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question upon the bill and the amendments. The Chair will direct those two gentlemen to act as tellers; the first question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky for the previous question upon the pending amendments.

Mr. BURCHARD. I made my point of order upon the whole bill of the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair has directed the thirteenth section to be stricken out upon the point of order. I think the same point of order lies against sections 11 and 12, which propose to change the laws in regard to the coin in the Treasury. There is nothing in the original bill to which either section 11 or 12 would be germane.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Are there any provisions in the acts of which this original bill is amendatory relating to that subject?

Mr. BURCHARD. I wish to say also that the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky proposes to change the existing laws in regard to the sale or disposition of United States five-twenty bonds, forbidding the sale of these bonds unless——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the point well taken.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the forty-second rule, and to ask whether, when the two motions for the previous question are made, the motion for the previous question upon the whole bill and pending amendments must not necessarily be first put? My point is, that as the motion for the previous question takes precedence of the motion to amend, necessarily a motion for the previous question upon the bill must take precedence of the motion for the previous question upon an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Clerk will read the rule to which the gentleman refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

> When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day, and at the same stage of the bill or proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if there is any deduction to be made from that rule it would be contrary to that made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, because the rules of the House should always be considered in the interest of offering amendments, that being the very essence of legislative power. Therefore the House should have the preference of the previous question first upon the amendment. But the Chair gives no preference in this case, except in the order in which the several amendments were submitted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suppose the object of giving precedence to the previous question was to limit free legislation.

The SPEAKER. To limit it in a particular instance. But the Chair will direct the question to be taken upon the motions in the order in which they were submitted.

Mr. MAYNARD. While the ruling asked for by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] would be favorable to the motion which I have made, I must still say that I think it would be in utter derogation of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not sustain the point; but it would make no possible difference, because the motions follow each other.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a privileged motion, and move that this bill be recommitted with instructions.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged motion, the pending question being upon seconding the previous question. The question will now be taken upon seconding the previous question upon pending amendments, not upon the bill; and the tellers will take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 94, noes 78.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was then ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment moved by Mr. COBURN to the bill of the committee; and being taken, it was not agreed to—ayes 21, noes not counted.

The question was next taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. HUNTER; and it was not agreed to.

The next question was upon the substitute moved by Mr. PACKER for the substitute proposed by Mr. BECK for the bill of the committee.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 83, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Barber, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Cook, Cotton, Creamer, Crooke, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Donnan, Dunnell, Farwell, Foster, Frye, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hodges, Houghton, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Lamport, Lansing, Lawson, Lowe, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, James W. McDill, McJunkin, Myers, Orr, Packard, Packer, Pratt, Rainey, Ray, Richmond, Ross, Sawyer, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sprague, Stowell, Strawbridge, Tremain, Waldron, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, and William Williams—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clymer, Coburn, Comingo, Corwin, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Durham, Eames, Eden, Field, Fort, Freeman, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Hunter, Hyde, Hynes, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Loughridge, Lowndes, Marshall, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Neal, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Randall, Rapier, Read, Rice, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sheats, Sherwood, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Stone, Swann, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Willie, Wilshire, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, and John D. Young—151.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arthur, Barry, Bromberg, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Crocker, Crounse, Curtis, Duell, Eldredge, Elliott, Glover, Hays, Hereford, Hersey, Howe, Hunton, Jewett, Kelley, Lamison, Lawrence, Lewis, Lofland, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Morrison, Negley, Nesmith, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Purman, Ransier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Sheldon, Sloan, Sloss, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Whiteley, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodford, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—63.

So the amendment of Mr. PACKER was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CALDWELL. My colleague, Mr. SLOSS, who has been called away from the House, would, if present, vote "no."

Mr. LYNCH. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. ELLIOTT. If he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. BURCHARD. I wish to announce that on all the different branches of this question the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CROCKER, who is detained from the House by illness, is paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SMITH.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. WOODFORD, who, if present, would vote in the affirmative, while I should vote in the negative.

Mr. MARSHALL. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, of Illinois, is now necessarily absent, and has not been able to be present to vote on any of these currency questions. If here he would vote in the negative on the pending question, and I may add, would oppose any measure tending to extend or perpetuate the national-banking system, or to confer additional privileges upon those engaged in the business of banking.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, but was interrupted by

The SPEAKER, who said: The Chair apprehends that members may not understand the question on which they are voting. It is on substituting the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] for the original bill. If adopted this substitute will stand in the place of the bill.

Mr. BECK. And will be subject to amendment, of course?

The SPEAKER. It will be subject to further amendment, but not to strike out any part of the text.

Mr. SPEER. Did I understand the Chair to say that the point of order in regard to the right of certain members to vote should be made before the roll-call is commenced, or at its conclusion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not draw any fine points upon this matter. He will allow the question to be made at any time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I then make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. The roll-call had better proceed.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Cessna, John B. Clarke, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, Durham, Eden, Field, Fort, Giddings, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, Herndon, Holman, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Marshall, McLean, Mellish, Milliken, Mills, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Orth, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Randall, Robbins, Milton Sayler, Sener, Sheats, Southard, Speer, Stone, Vance, Waddell, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Willie, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Averill, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Myers, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Rapier, Ray, Read, Rice, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, St. John, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Christopher Y. Thomas, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—163.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arthur, Barry, Bass, Bromberg, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Crocker, Duell, Eldredge, Elliott, Glover, Hays, Hereford, Hersey, Hooper, Howe, Hunton, Jewett, Kelley, Lamison, Lawrence, Luttrell, Magee, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Negley, Nesmith, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Purman, Rainey, Ransier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Sloan, Sloss, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Wallace, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, and Wood—59.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COBURN, of Indiana, said: My colleague, Mr. SAYLER, is absent. If he were here he would vote "no."

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SPEER said: Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which shows that the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] who has voted in the negative, is the president of a national bank. It further shows that the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HAMILTON,] on this side of the House, who has also voted in the negative, is the president of a national bank. I hold in my hand the Congressional Directory, which shows that Mr. PHELPS, of New Jersey, is the director of several national banks. These gentlemen have all voted in the negative. The bill or amendment on which they have voted provides in the eighth section—

That in lieu of the tax of 1 per cent. per annum now imposed by law on the outstanding circulation of national banks, a tax of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually in gold, shall be collected upon the circulation which has been issued to each national bank which has not been returned for cancellation.

I raise the point of order that these gentlemen, belonging to both political parties—Mr. POLAND, of Vermont; Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey; and Mr. PHELPS, of New Jersey—have not the right to vote, being personally interested; and upon that point I ask the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. COX. I desire to make a statement to the House on this subject, and I wish to be frank and explicit about it. I suppose that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when he had the rule read, did not know that I had bank stock, and meant nothing personal. But the matter has been before the House formerly. The gentleman from Missouri some time since offered a resolution here asking for a list of bank stockholders and officers. I voted for it. I have uniformly, as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and as a member of this House, voted to tax the stock of banks, and always at the maximum, and on every occasion, and irrespective of interest, I have voted always to tax the banks for the manufacture of their notes. We have had several contests on that. I wanted to-day to vote for this extra tax of 3 per cent. in the bill of my friend from Kentucky—the 3 per cent. in the eighth section. But how can I vote for this bill with that in it, unless I am more or less to be reproached for voting for other parts of the bill I do not agree to? I may be in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky, and yet may want to oppose the eighth section, or vice versa. And am I to be reproached in this House or elsewhere for the vote I may give on that bill? My very cautious care is my enemy. The Chair ruled a short time ago that with this general interest I might vote; but it is not yet ruled that one in interest may vote against that interest. Of the eighty-odd bank men in this House I am one of a very few who vote, as is believed, in the general and not in the particular interest. I do not profess to be specially disinterested; but I do not care to sit here without challenging a settlement of the question.

Mr. CREAMER. I rise to a question of order. The Chair has already ruled on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not really ruled on it. The Chair may have foreshadowed his opinion, but did not rule.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The point of order may be briefly discussed.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to state in justice to the gentlemen whose names I have taken the liberty to use that I have selected them not from any personal hostility, but as representatives of a class. I believe there are eighty or a hundred gentlemen in this House who are similarly situated. I have selected these gentlemen because there is authentic evidence here of their interest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say a single word. It seems to me that this is a point which it is of a good deal of consequence should be decided once for all. Therefore I desire to make a single observation.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. This is in order. The Chair has the right to hear discussion upon a point of order, and on one of this magnitude the Chair has no desire to abridge discussion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The point of order raises a question which ought to be decided, and decided finally by the House, if anybody doubts the ruling of the Chair. In the case of any one of these gentlemen who have been named it is not a reproach to him that he owns bank stock. The question is this, does this holding of bank stock come within the ruling of the House, and the vote on this particular bill raises the question sharply.

This amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky proposes to tax this individual property of the member 3 per cent. on the circulation of the bank, and raises the tax upon that distinct from any other property in the United States. This brings up the question whether there can be a class of property in the United States, which is not possessed by all the people of the United States, such that a member owning it can be said, within the rule, not to be interested more than the general public. Without indicating any opinion on that subject, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that it comes directly to that; and if the rule is not operative there, where is it to be operative? Is it only to be operative when there is only one member of the House, or two members of the House, or three members of the House interested in a particular question? Does the extent of the number interested operate to take the individual out of the rule?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would like to ask how this differs from the tax on gold watches and silver plate?

Mr. DAWES. Is this the line of distinction, that when a member of the House belongs to a class of the community that may be affected one way or the other by the legislation, he is permitted to vote; but if he be an individual, to whom, as an individual, the question of interest applies, aside from a class, then he will be within the rule? The holder of bank stock would be no more interested in this measure than the holder of stock in a manufacturing company in the United States, upon the question whether you will impose a duty upon foreign manufactures. It is a class of the community. There can be no legislation had that does not affect, directly or indirectly, every member of the community, as a member of the community itself, or as a member of a class of the community.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that the question in fact lies somewhat back of the rules of the House, and while the Chair is going to give his opinion upon the rule and construe it, he begs to make a remark that goes somewhat deeper than the rule.

When a very distinguished predecessor in this chair, Mr. Macon, of North Carolina, occupied it, as is familiar to the House, a question arose upon the amendment to the Constitution changing the mode of counting the votes for the election of President and Vice-President. The rule at that time was peremptory that the Speaker should not vote, except in the case of a tie. It has been since changed. The vote, if the Chair remembers correctly, as handed up to Mr. Macon, was 83 in favor of the amendment and 42 opposed to it. The amendment did not have the necessary two-thirds, and the rule absolutely forbade the Speaker to vote, and yet he did vote, and the amendment became ingrafted in the Constitution of the United States upon that vote; and he voted upon the distinct declaration that the House had no right to adopt any rule abridging the right of a member to vote; that he voted upon his responsibility to his conscience, and to his constituents; that, although that rule was positive and peremptory, it did not have any effect upon his right. He voted, and, if the Chair remembers correctly, it was attempted to contest afterward, by some judicial process, whether the amendment was legally adopted. But the movement proved abortive, and the amendment is now a part of the Constitution. Now the question comes back, whether or not the House has a right to say to any member that he shall not vote upon any question, and especially if the House has a right to say, that if 147 members come here, each owning one share of national-bank stock, (which there is no law to prohibit them from holding,) they shall by reason of that very fact be incapacitated from legislating on this whole question. If there is a majority of one in the House that hold each a single share of bank stock, and it incapacitates the members from voting, then, of course, the House cannot approach that legislation; it stops right there.

Mr. POTTER. Let me ask at this point, if a member is incapacitated to vote in his own interest, is he equally incapacitated to vote against his interest?

The SPEAKER. O, of course; that makes no difference. The point raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] as to voting against his interests, the Chair thinks does not change the question at all.

Mr. COX. I thought so myself.

The SPEAKER. It does not make the slightest difference on the question. Now it has always been held that where legislation affected a class as distinct from individuals a member might vote. Of course every one will see the impropriety of the sitting member in the case of a contest voting on his own case. That is so palpably an individual personal interest that there can be no question about it. It comes right down to that single man; there is no class in the matter at all. But where a man does not stand in any way distinct from a class, the uniform rulings of the American House of Representatives and of the British Parliament, from which we derive our rulings, have been one way. In the year 1871—the Chair is indebted for the suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] but he remembers the case himself—when a bill was pending in the British House of Commons to abolish the right to sell commissions in the army, which officers had always theretofore enjoyed and to give a specific sum of money to each army officer in lieu thereof, there were many officers of the army members of the British House of Commons, as there always are, and the point was made that those members could not vote on that bill because they had immediate and direct pecuniary interest in it. The House of Commons did not sustain the point, because the officers referred to only had that interest which was in common with the entire class of army officers outside of the House, many thousands in number. Since I have had the honor of being a member of this House, on the floor and in the chair, many bills giving bounty to soldiers have been voted on here. We have the honor of the presence on this floor of many gentlemen distinguished in the military service who had the benefit of those bounties directly and indirectly. It never could be made a point that they were incapacitated from voting on those bills. They did not enjoy the benefit arising from the legislation distinct and separate from thousands of men in the country who had held similar positions. It was not an interest distinct from the public interest in any way.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the same with pensions.

The SPEAKER. And the same with pensions, as the gentleman from Ohio suggests. And further, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] has well said, if it should be decided to-day that a member who holds a share of national-bank stock shall not vote on a question relating to national banks, then the question might come up whether a member interested in the manufacture of cotton shall have the right to vote upon the tariff on cotton goods; or whether a member representing a cotton State shall vote upon the question of whether cotton shall be taxed, for that interest is largely represented here by gentlemen engaged in the planting of cotton. And so you can go through the whole round of business and find upon this floor gentlemen who, in common with many citizens outside of this House, have an interest in questions before the House. But they do not have that interest separate and distinct from a class, and, within the meaning of the rule, distinct from the public interest. The Chair, therefore, has no hesitation in saying that he does not sustain the point of order presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. Allow me a moment.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order! Regular order!

Mr. SPEER. Will the Chair cut me off by the regular order?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be a little patient——

Mr. SPEER. Ordinarily a court hears the argument before it decides.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not decide until argument was presented.

Mr. SPEER. The Chair has ruled upon the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman if he desires to make a statement.

Mr. SPEER. I do not desire to argue with the Chair after he has decided the question. It would have been at least courteous to have heard me before he decided it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it proposed to appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SPEER. Certainly, it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker has made a very interesting statement of what he termed a principle involved "back of the rule." How does the Chair reconcile what he has now stated with his decision in reference to the right of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] to vote upon the Pacific Railroad bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that was a single corporation, holding a different relation from the general system of banking throughout the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. But that gentleman was here, and had his conscience and his duty to his constituents which he must consider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not put here to say what the rules should be, but to construe what they are.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair stated that the member was responsible to his own conscience and the constituency which he represented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not say that; the Chair stated that Mr. Macon so stated, which is a higher authority than that of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that it is any better.

The SPEAKER. An appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this House?

Mr. PARSONS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. SPEER. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being only 13 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires that this vote shall be taken by tellers, so that it may go upon the record. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, who appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. PARSONS, who moved to lay that appeal on the table, will act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 193, noes 9.

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid upon the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before leaving this question, and for the purpose of elucidating more fully the principle involved, I desire to inquire whether, if there be members of this House who are private bankers, it might not be for their interest to blot out the national banks and thus help themselves. And why cannot the point of order be made upon them as well as upon the others?

Mr. RANDALL. Expose them as the others have been exposed.

Mr. SPEER. To whom does the gentleman address the inquiry?

Mr. GARFIELD. To the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The rule would be just the same.

Mr. SPEER. I believe the Chair cannot rule upon a question until it is raised.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now announce the result of the vote upon the substitute moved by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] for the original bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The names of the members whose votes were challenged will remain on the roll. The result of the vote by yeas and nays is—yeas 68, nays 163; and the substitute is rejected.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I desire to move to amend the original bill by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I desire to move as a substitute for the bill the text of the Senate bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rose and addressed the Chair, but I understood the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts on my left, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] I did not understand that the Chair recognized me as entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. There were a great many members standing around the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] The first voice that attracted the attention of the Chair was that of the gentleman from Massachusetts in front of the Chair, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I understood the fact to be as the Chair has announced; but gentlemen around me seemed to think differently.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I spoke the instant the Chair stopped speaking.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I spoke as near that time as I could.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts in front of the Chair.

The Clerk read the amendment moved by Mr. E. R. HOAR, as follows:

That from and after the 1st day of September, in the year 1874, nothing but gold and silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender for the payment of any debt thereafter contracted.

That from and after the 1st day of September, in the year 1874, every holder of United States notes shall have the right to exchange them at the Treasury of the United States, in sums of $100 or any multiple thereof, for bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. a year, payable semi-annually, which bonds shall be redeemable after ten years from their date, at the pleasure of the United States, and payable at thirty years from their date, payable principal and interest in gold; and the notes so exchanged shall be canceled and destroyed, and not reissued; and no new notes shall be issued in lieu thereof.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have been importuned very much to allow further amendments. I will allow the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] to offer one as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and then——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make the point of order that the amendment offered by my colleague on my right [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts] is not in order under the forty-eighth rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand the Senate bill is now pending in this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish it were.

The SPEAKER. Bills on the Speaker's table are not pending; their contents are not even presumed to be known to the House until the bills are taken up.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Are they not announced to the House by message from the Senate?

The SPEAKER. They are announced by their titles merely, and are recorded by their titles. They are not before the House for any motion, and are not in any parliamentary sense pending. If the House had heretofore taken up the Senate bill and referred it to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the point of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be good.

Mr. KELLOGG. One word on that point. I submit to the Chair and to the House whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has not several times stated that his amendment was the Senate bill, and whether the Chair has not so announced?

The SPEAKER. Precisely. It is known as a matter of public notoriety that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is the exact language of the Senate bill; but the rule is not administered on that basis.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My amendment is not precisely the same as the Senate bill; I have left out two or three commas.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to inquire whether the Senate bill has not been introduced as a House bill and referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not so advised.

Mr. MYERS. Even if a bill identical in form with that of the Senate were introduced and referred here, it would not be the Senate bill. Congress frequently adjourns with bills on the table which are never reached.

The SPEAKER. But a point of order would be good against this amendment if it were identical with a bill already referred in the House.

Mr. MYERS. But no such bill has been referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will observe——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not wish particularly to press the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not hold the point good; but even where it does obtain, the rule can be evaded by a very slight variation in the text of the proposition sought to be offered. By striking out or changing a word, the effect of the rule can be obviated. It is not a rule of any very binding force even where it applies.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now demand the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] offered an amendment to the original bill. His colleague [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts] offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] indicated a wish to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] proposed to offer an amendment to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. Those amendments are in order.

Mr. MAYNARD. And they, as I understand, are all the amendments admissible under the rules.

The SPEAKER. With these amendments pending, the power of amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MAYNARD. And that being the state of the bill, I demanded the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

SEC. —. That in case any increase of national-bank circulation beyond the present authorized limit of $354,000,000 shall take place, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retire and cancel legal-tender notes to the extent of 25 per cent. of such increase, until the outstanding and unpaid legal-tender notes shall be reduced to $300,000,000.

SEC. —. That so much of the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually, and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent. as therein prescribed shall apply to the extent of the legal-tender notes retired and canceled under the preceding section of this act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute for that offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] The Clerk will read it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is it in order now to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair will state when it is in order. When the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] shall have been read it is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency to demand the previous question on the bill and amendments. If that motion does not prevail the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] to move to recommit the bill. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of section 22 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and all other acts or parts of acts, in so far as the amount of notes for circulation is limited thereby, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 31 of said act as requires such associations, organized pursuant thereto, to have on hand in lawful money of the United States any amount on account of circulation be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That no association heretofore, or that may be hereafter, organized pursuant to said act shall pay to any other association or bank any interest on deposits; nor shall any association heretofore organized, or that may hereafter be organized, under said act receive any interest from any other such association or bank of discount or discount and deposit.

SEC. 4. That the person appointed to make examinations pursuant to section 54 of said act shall, in addition to the other duties prescribed in said section, ascertain whether any bonds or stocks of any corporation, association, or joint-stock company have been taken as security, in whole or in part, for any loan or discount, directly or indirectly, by such association, and shall report in writing to the Comptroller of the Currency the amount of loans or discounts since his last report upon the security, in whole or in part, of bonds and stocks, or either, and the amount and kinds of bonds and stocks taken by such association as security. He shall also ascertain and report what, if any, bonds or stocks have been, since his last report, purchased by such association, and what disposition has been made of the same. Said examiner shall publish said report in two successive issues of a daily newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in the county or parish in which such association is situate, or, if there is no daily, then in some weekly newspaper of general circulation printed and published in such county or parish, and if there is no weekly, then in the weekly printed and published nearest thereto; and such association shall pay the expense of such publication.

SEC. 5. That if any association shall do any act herein prohibited, or shall conceal, or attempt to conceal, from such examiner any receipt of stock or bonds as security for any loan or loans, discount or discounts, or any purchase of bonds or stocks, it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to appoint a receiver, who shall take charge of the assets of such association, and proceed to dispose of the same in all things as is provided by said act in case of default in redeeming circulating notes of such association.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 78, noes 73.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 14.

Mr. FORT. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes, 42; more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Mr. FORT and Mr. WILLIE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 42.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of those present) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a personal statement. The Chair will carefully revise the notes of the reporters, as he always does where an appeal is made on a point of order; and he intends to incorporate into his remarks one single thing which escaped him as an illustration. And that is, that on the question of repealing the income tax every member of the House would have been incapacitated from voting.

Mr. SPEER. I suppose the Chair will not strike out anything that is in the reporters' notes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no desire to do so. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania mean by that intimation?

Mr. SPEER. I have observed frequently in reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the morning that I have not found personal debates of this character reported as to my recollection they occurred in this House.

The SPEAKER. Where the Chair was concerned?

Mr. SPEER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Frequently?

Mr. SPEER. And where I understood the notes were revised by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state a case?

Mr. SPEER. I instance the case with reference to the power which was sought for the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state another case?

Mr. SPEER. The Chair asked me to give one case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated "frequently." Will he state another case?

Mr. SPEER. Does the Chair deny it with reference to that case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state what warrant he has for saying that the Chair frequently revises the reporters' notes.

Mr. SPEER. I recollect another case—the controversy with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

The SPEAKER. That is the same case. The Chair does not desire that there shall be the slightest exhibition of temper in this matter. The Chair, in the case which has been referred to, made a hasty remark which he thought ought not to appear in the RECORD, because it was wounding to the feelings of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] had made a remark indicating that such was the effect of it. On consultation with the gentleman from Massachusetts, he having the entire control of his remarks and the Chair of his, it was thought better that that should not appear in the RECORD. It was done entirely out of good-nature and without the knowledge of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER.] It was done in order that nothing in the slightest degree undignified or ruffling to the temper of any member should go on the record as coming from the Chair.

Mr. SPEER. I am not questioning the motives of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman used the term "frequently." The Chair would be apt on that point to have a recollection somewhat superior to that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the Chair states that he has not been sufficiently in the habit of revising his notes, as the reporters know, and he does not recollect a single instance, except that which has been referred to, in which he has altered them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. So far as I know, since I have been in the House, whenever there has been a personal debate on the floor, and the two members who were parties to it chose to strike out the remarks on one side and the other, it has always been done.

The SPEAKER. It was done wholly in the interest of good nature, entirely so; and the Chair thought that in revising the notes upon this decision, which is an important one, he would use the illustration he has referred to; and out of abundant caution, lest any gentleman might suppose that he had interjected something, he gave notice that he would put it in.

Mr. KELLOGG. Allow me one question. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] seemed to take offense because the Chair did not allow debate. The question I wish to put is, whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he made the point of order should not have debated it then?

Mr. SPEER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The question was taken on Mr. NIBLACK's motion; and there were—yeas 121, nays 110, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barber, Barnum, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Danford, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Durham, Eames, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Before the result of the vote was announced, the following proceedings took place:

The SPEAKER. The request is made that the pending amendments to the currency bill may be printed, and printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the bill as amended may also be printed, and be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill and amendments are as follows:

A bill to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 31 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved on the 3d day of June, in the year 1864, be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the money required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 2. That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained. And the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved on the 3d of March, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and section 21 of the original act to which the act last aforesaid is an amendment, be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted.

SEC. 3. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer or to any assistant treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Comptroller of the currency to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or, if worn, mutilated or defaced, new notes instead shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

SEC. 4. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon deposit of lawful money within the meaning of said acts, in sums of not less than $10,000, with the Treasurer of the United States, withdraw a proportionate amount of bonds deposited in pledge for such circulation; and he shall redeem, cancel, and destroy an amount of the circulating notes of such association equal to the amount issued upon such bonds.

SEC. 5. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall keep its lawful-money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful-money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That upon all circulating notes hereafter issued, or hereafter to be issued, whenever the same shall come into the Treasury in payment or deposit, for redemption or otherwise, there shall be printed, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the charter numbers of the associations by which they are severally issued.

Amendment in the nature of a substitute submitted by Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts:

A bill to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

SEC. 2. That forty-six millions in notes for circulation in addition to such circulation now allowed by law shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter, and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870. And each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

Amendment submitted by Mr. WILSON, of Indiana:

Add to the end of the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, the following:

That so much of section 22 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and all other acts or parts of acts, in so far as the amount of notes for circulation is limited thereby, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 31 of said act as requires such associations organized pursuant thereto to have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, any amount on account of circulation be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That no association, heretofore or that may be hereafter organized pursuant to said act, shall pay to any other association or bank any interest on deposits; nor shall any association heretofore organized, or that may hereafter be organized under said act, receive any interest from any other such association or bank of discount, or discount and deposit.

SEC. 4. That the person appointed to make examinations pursuant to section 54 of said act shall, in addition to the other duties prescribed in said section, ascertain whether any bonds or stocks of any corporation, association, or joint-stock company have been taken as security, in whole or in part, for any loan or discount, directly or indirectly, by such association, and shall report in writing to the Comptroller of the Currency the amount of loans or discounts since his last report upon the security, in whole or in part, of bonds and stocks, or either, and the amount and kinds of bonds and stocks taken by such association as security. He shall also ascertain and report what, if any, bonds or stocks have been, since his last report, purchased by such association, and what disposition has been made of the same. Said examiner shall publish said report in two successive issues of a daily newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in the county or parish in which such association is situate, or, if there is no daily, then in some weekly newspaper of general circulation printed and published in such county or parish, and if there is no weekly, then in the weekly printed and published nearest thereto; and such association shall pay the expense of such publication.

SEC. 5. That if any association shall do any act herein prohibited, or shall conceal, or shall attempt to conceal, from such examiner any receipt of stock or bonds as security for any loan or loans, discount or discounts, or any purchase of bonds or stocks, it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to appoint a receiver, who shall take charge of the assets of such association, and proceed to dispose of the same in all things as is provided by said act in case of default in redeeming circulating notes of such association.

Amendment submitted by Mr. FOSTER:

SEC. —. That in case any increase of national-bank note circulation beyond the present authorized limit of $354,000,000 shall take place, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retire and cancel legal-tender notes to the extent of 25 per cent. of such increase until the outstanding and unpaid legal-tender notes shall be reduced to $300,000,000.

SEC. —. That so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually, and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent. as therein prescribed shall apply to the extent of the legal-tender notes retired and canceled under the preceding section of this act.

Amendment submitted by Mr. E. R. HOAR:

SEC. —. That from and after the 1st day of September, in the year 1874, nothing but gold and silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender for the payment of any debts thereafter contracted.

SEC. —. That from and after the 1st day of September, in the year 1874, every holder of United States notes shall have the right to exchange them at the Treasury of the United States in sums of $100, or any multiple thereof, for bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. a year, payable semi-annually, which bonds shall be redeemable after ten years from their date, at the pleasure of the United States, and payable at thirty years from their date, payable principal and interest in gold; and the notes so exchanged shall be canceled and destroyed and not reissued, and no new notes shall be reissued in lieu thereof.

Mr. SHANKS. I have an amendment which I propose to offer, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The amendment was as follows:

Amend section 2 of the original bill so that it will read:

That forty-six millions in notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and that section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT: The petition of Lieutenant Julius Sprandel, of the District of Columbia, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of Mary Ann Hale, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of Francis Dandelat, of Baltimore, Maryland, to be reimbursed taxes alleged to have been unjustly and illegally collected from him, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WILLIE: Resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, asking an appropriation by Congress to improve the navigation of Soda Lake and Cypress Bayous, to the Committee on Commerce.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 13, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I present the memorial of the New York Cheap Transportation Association and also of merchants, manufacturers, and citizens of New York, touching the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate in the East River. This petition is signed by a great number of business men and citizens of New York, and sets forth the urgent needs of intervention by the Government there to clear that channel. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also joint resolutions of the senate and assembly of the State of New York, with a message of the governor appended as part of the resolutions, touching the national finances. In each house of the New York Legislature both political parties are fully represented, and these resolutions were adopted in the larger house unanimously and in the senate with but three dissenting voices. I ask that they be read.

Mr. FENTON. As might be supposed, I have also a copy of these joint resolutions of the New York Legislature and of the message of the governor upon the demoralizing and dangerous tendency of the apprehended national legislation in regard to the currency. I wish to supplement what my colleague has said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator that debate is out of order beyond a brief statement of the contents of the paper to be presented.

Mr. FENTON. That is what I wish now to do. I wish to supplement what my colleague has said with the remark that these resolutions express in clear and forcible language the alarm felt by the people of our State at the prospect of an increase of the volume of our vitiated paper money and the violated pledge of the Government of the United States to return at the earlist practicable period to specie payment.

These expressions, Mr. President, are not more remarkable——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is debate and out of order.

Mr. FENTON. Then I will only say that I unite with my colleague in the request that the resolutions may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
In Senate, Albany, April 7, 1874.

Whereas his excellency the governor of the State of New York has this day transmitted to the Legislature a special message relating to the inflation of the currency by the General Government, calling attention to the disastrous effect of such action upon the welfare and prosperity of the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, (if the assembly concur,) That we fully approve and heartily indorse the sentiments expressed in such message; and in view thereof, and of the act of Congress approved March, 1869, which affirmed that the faith of the United States was solemnly pledged to the payment in coin of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, (known as United States notes,) and that the United States also solemnly pledged its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin; and as this pledge has been repeatedly given, it is the judgment of the Legislature of the State of New York that it is the duty of the Administration of the General Government at Washington and of Congress to stay the pernicious and ruinous policy of increasing the volume of irredeemable paper currency.

And be it further resolved, (if the assembly concur,) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to resist, by all efforts in their power, any inflation of the currency through the further issue of circulating notes by the Government or by national banks, and that they be, and are also hereby, requested respectively to promote by all proper measures an early return to specie payments.

And be it further resolved, (if the assembly concur,) That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit these resolutions, with a copy of his message appended, to the President of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

By order:

HENRY A. GLIDDEN, Clerk.

IN ASSEMBLY, April 8, 1874.

The foregoing resolutions were duly passed.

By order:

JOHN O'DONNELL, Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING. The message is part of the resolutions and should be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Executive Chamber, Albany, April 7, 1874.

To the Legislature:

I deem it due to the interest and honor of the State to call upon you, as its chosen representatives, to take into consideration the proposition before Congress in regard to the currency. Though yet immature and requiring the concurrent action of both Houses to give them the validity of law, they have, nevertheless, received in each such partial sanction as to excite serious alarm as to the result. In my annual message in January last I expressed the earnest hope that the paper circulation issued by the Government would be curtailed, and that early steps would be taken to resume specie payments.

I did not anticipate that so extraordinary a proposition as that of inflating the currency by adding to outstanding legal-tender notes, or by authorizing further issue of national-bank paper, would be seriously made. In view of the purpose which has been indicated to enlarge the volume of paper of both descriptions, and to repudiate all attempts to re-establish the standard of specie—a policy, as I sincerely believe, fraught with wide-spread ruin to the industry of the country and with imminent danger to its credit—I invoke your interposition to contribute all in your power to prevent its adoption. Your opinion, representing as you do more largely than the Legislature of any other State the financial and commercial interests of the Union, should carry with it great weight.

The flagrant injustice of the proposed measure will be the more apparent when you consider that, if adopted without repealing the legal-tender act, the results will be not only to depreciate the paper currency still further, but to compel its acceptance in payment of debt, thus openly violating the solemnly proclaimed pledges of the Government five years ago to redeem its notes in specie at the earliest practicable period, impairing the obligation of contracts, and consummating what the Constitution prohibits to the States as an act of moral and political turpitude. To degrade the currency, and at the same time to compel the people to receive it as equivalent to specie, would be the most tyrannical exercise and abuse of financial power of which civilized government has ever been guilty in time of peace. It differs in no essential respect either under its moral or its practical effects from a degradation of the standard of specie by an adulteration of the national coin.

Five years ago the sense of rectitude would have revolted at the suggestion of such an act of perfidy; but a persistence in wrong and injustice rarely fails to reconcile further wrong to the thought first and to the purpose afterward. If, spurning away all the teachings of history and trampling under foot all the maxims of political justice, we adopt a policy as fraudulent as it is demoralizing, our successors will look back on our conduct with humiliation and shame. The millions of depreciated and irredeemable paper, if issued as proposed, will, by a law of distribution which no human power can control, be poured into the city of New York to uphold and stimulate stock-gambling; to glut the channels of industry, embarrass all honest transactions of business; to cause reactions in the various departments of labor by which the working classes are thrown out of employment, and to shake to its foundations the fabric of the public credit. Against the introduction of such an instrument of dishonor and calumny we should enter our solemn protest as we would against any other flood of contamination. I speak with a clear understanding of the force of my words. I believe and trust you will concur with me in the opinion that the emergency demands the plainest and most emphatic language. I therefore recommend such an expression on your part as may comport with the dignity of the Legislature and as you may deem due to the interest of your constituents. I am not without hope that a timely declaration of your views to be presented to Congress through the Senators and Representatives from this State may arrest the torrent of disgrace and disaster with which the country is threatened from this source. If your protests and warnings are unheeded, you will have the consolation of reflecting when the evil comes upon us that no effort on your part has been spared to avert it.

JOHN A. DIX.

The resolutions and message were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a petition of certain citizens of Minnesota which I will read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned would most respectfully represent:

That Anson Northup, of the State of Minnesota, was appointed wagon-master to the First Minnesota Regiment of Volunteers on the 29th of April, 1861, and served in such capacity until September, 1861, when he was appointed to the same position to the brigade commanded by General W. A. Gorman; and in March, 1862, he was appointed to the same place in the division of General Sedgwick; and in June, 1862, he was appointed and put in charge of the train of Sumner's Corps, and remained with the Army of the Potomac until August, 1862.

Said Northup then came to Minnesota to aid the people in suppressing the Indian outbreak in this State.

On the next day after his arrival at Minneapolis, Minnesota, he commenced to raise a company of cavalry for said service, and filled it with ninety-six men the same day, and started that night and traveled twenty-five miles; and in three days he landed at daylight at Fort Ridgely with one hundred and forty men, partly recruited on the way. He then scoured the country, and rendered great service to the public and humanity.

In this service he had a captain's commission from his excellency Governor ALEXANDER RAMSEY, for which service on the said Indian expedition he has not received a cent of pay of any kind. In April, 1865, he was appointed by General Sully, at Fort Snelling, wagon-master to his expedition up the Missouri River, to and across the Yellowstone, and back to Sioux City, Iowa, in November, 1865. He was also with General Sully, in the same capacity, in said Sully's first expedition up the Missouri and back to Fort Snelling, from the spring of 1864 to November, 1864. During part of Sully's second expedition up the Missouri said Northup acted as guide to said expedition, without any extra pay whatever for said extra perilous service. In consideration of said long, perilous, and valuable service, not yet compensated, save a wagon-master's pay, we ask the Government of the United States to allow him six hundred and forty acres of land, to enable him to settle his children thereon, or in such way as it may seem just and equitable.

CHARLES E. FLANDREAU,
Colonel in Minnesota Indian War.
D. W. HAND.
STEPHEN MILLER,
Lieutenant Colonel First Minnesota Volunteers.

I have known this gentleman long and well. I know that all that is said therein of him is true. I move that the petition, with the evidence accompanying it, be referred to the Commitee on Public Lands, and hope that the committee may regard the prayer of the petition favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of John S. Long, late sergeant Company D, First Battalion Twelfth Regiment United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DORSEY presented the memorial of the mayor and common council of Fort Smith, Arkansas, asking that certain improvements be made to facilitate the navigation of the Arkansas River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. I present additional testimony in the case of Jules L. Williams, who had previously asked for a pension; and in this connection I ask that an order be made withdrawing those papers and his petition from the files of the Senate, and that it be referred, with this additional testimony, to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I present a memorial signed by several hundred citizens of Texas, touching the alleged expulsion of Governor Davis from office before the expiration of his term. It is the same in substance as I presented the other day. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOREMAN presented certain papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 653) for the relief of E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of internal revenue fifth district of Virginia; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Mines and Mining.

There being no objection, Mr. CHANDLER was excused; and the President pro tempore, by unanimous consent, was authorized to fill the vacancy.

Mr. JONES was appointed to fill the vacancy.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and papers of the Mercantile Insurance Company of New York, praying the reissue to them of legal-tender notes to the amount of $8,000 in place of notes to that amount insured by them and alleged to be lost at sea, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that its prayer ought not to be allowed. I move that the report be printed and adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of Bigler, Young & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Smith, a disabled soldier of the First Regiment of Michigan Light Artillery, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 690) granting a pension to Thomas Smith, late a private in Company C, First Regiment Michigan Light Artillery.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 265) to establish the Corcoran Park and Zoological Garden near the Capital, in the District of Columbia, and to incorporate a society to maintain the same and a company to construct a street railroad thereto, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 691) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the several States and Territories with the sums charged for arms and munitions issued under the act of April 23, 1808; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 692) to make uniform the pensions of widows of staff officers of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARPENTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 693) to change the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin at Oshkosh; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 694) to compensate Colonel D. R. Haggard for six months' service as colonel of the Fifth Kentucky United States Cavalry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SCHOONER ADA A. ANDREWS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles F. Sampson and others, principal owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews, praying to be indemnified for losses sustained by them in consequence of the sinking of their schooner by the United States steamer Ticonderoga, on the 1st day of May, 1871, to report it back with a bill ordering it to be referred to the Court of Claims. This is a reference to the Court of Claims of a matter which it is impossible for any committee of the Senate to investigate with justice either to the claimants or to the Government, and if there be no objection I should like to have the bill passed.

The bill (S. No. 688) referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews to the Court of Claims was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may amount to a large sum. I think it had better take the usual course. I ask the Senator whether under the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims such a suit may not be brought now?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. This was referred to the Committee on Claims, and on their motion was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a matter in which the parties ought to have an investigation. It is utterly impossible to have such an investigation before a committee of Congress. It would take a week.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it a case of collision by a Government vessel riding down a private vessel?

Mr. CONKLING. Where did that occur?

Mr. ANTHONY. Somewhere off the coast of Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

HAYDEN'S CRETACEOUS FLORA OF THE WEST.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to move that the report of Professor Hayden on the Cretaceous Flora of the West be printed. All the expensive part of this document is already done from the original appropriation, the plates are engraved, and this is merely for the letter-press to go with it, which will cost $600 for printing and binding.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is to complete a work?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir. I move simply that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now from the same committee I report back a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, ordering certain copies of that work to be printed for the use of the Department, and ask its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed and bound twenty-five hundred copies in quarto (uniform with the series) of Professor Hayden's report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West—one thousand copies for the Department of the Interior, one thousand copies for the Smithsonian Institution, and five hundred copies for the office of the United States geological survey of the Territories.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senator will not object if he understands it. This is not for popular distribution; it is for distribution in the way the Senator himself indicated that such documents should be distributed by the Departments. It is absurd to have these expensive surveys, to have the plates printed, and to have all the work done except just printing the letter-press, and then suppress that. You might as well build a house and not put a roof on it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is a consideration, after all——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator to object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do; but I wish to say one word in explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order if the Senator objects.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there will be unanimous consent to allow the Senator to make his statement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was simply saying that I do not rise absolutely to object, because I conceive that in a general way this comes within the rule which I dare say we shall all agree to as to publishing these works for the Departments for the use of the Government independent of the question of distribution; but then there is a question in regard to how these works shall be published by the Departments, and under what direction; and that question is under consideration at the present time. I will talk to the Senate about it, but I would like to have this resolution lie on the table for the present

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go on the Calendar.

THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a memorial of certain employing printers of this city, have instructed me to make a report in writing; and as the allegations of this memorial affect the Congressional Printer, who is an officer in the Senate, and as he is charged with malfeasance which he could not have committed except in complicity with the judges of the Supreme Court and Court of Claims and Senators and Representatives, I think it proper, with your permission, for me to briefly state the conclusions to which the Senate committee have arrived on those points.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will be allowed to make that statement if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. The allegations of these memorialists are four in number. The first is that the Congressional Printer prints the records of the Supreme Court and the Court of Claims where the United States is not a party, for which the memorialists say there is "no warrant of law," and that the Congressional Printer "has neither law nor justice" in proceeding to execute the work required. The law on this point is explicit. Repeated statutes require that all the executive, legislative, and judicial printing shall be executed at the Government Printing Office, and the appropriation bills contain items for printing for the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court. Of course the appropriation is administered by the judges themselves. The printer has no right to inquire into the propriety of the order of the court. I believe, although there has been some complaint made of the decisions of the court, there has been no appeal yet provided for from the Supreme Court to the Congressional Printer. And so far from violating the law in what he has done, he would have violated the law if he had done otherwise. Whether it is proper that the records in these cases should be printed at the public expense is a matter which he has no right to inquire into. This is discussed somewhat in the report and provided for in a bill.

The second allegation is that the work for the custom-houses and post-offices throughout the country is executed at the Government Printing Office at 25 to 30 per cent. beyond the price that it could be done for at private contract. What the work could be done for at private contract I do not know. I presume that the work could be done by private contract, where the daily hours of labor are ten, instead of eight, cheaper than at the Government Printing Office; but it has not been done by private contract at anything like the present cost of the work. Some years ago the Committee on Printing had an investigation of this matter, which resulted in ordering all the binding for all the Departments and all the executive offices of the Government to be executed at the Government Printing Office, which ran up the cost of binding to more than three times the old amount. Every blank-book—the custom-houses, post-offices, internal-revenue offices—is done at the Government Printing Office. There is appended to this report a letter from the chief clerk of the Treasury Department to the Congressional Printer, in which he says that the work is 50 per cent. better and 25 to 30 per cent. cheaper than it was when it was done under contract.

The third allegation is that the printing of the Patent Office can be executed by contract at 30 per cent. below the cost at the Government Printing Office. The printing of the Patent Office was transferred from contractors to the Government Printing Office after a very thorough investigation by the Committee on Printing of both Houses. We found great irregularities and extravagance, and it resulted in changing the whole system and abolishing the very expensive work which we had been printing, and that cost something like $200,000 a year, I think $240,000, and it would have been at least $350,000 by this time. An Official Gazette has been substituted, which is printed weekly, and which brings the information down almost to the very day of publication; whereas the old system only gave it from about twelve months to a year and a half after the patents had been granted; and this is issued in large part by subscription, not, as the memorialists say, at a dollar a year, but at five dollars a year, or when only a single copy is taken at one post-office at six dollars a year. The idea of this Gazette was suggested by the present Commissioner of Patents, whom I regard as a very valuable and efficient officer, and it has made the Patent Office publications more accessible, more valuable, and a good deal cheaper.

The fourth allegation is that the Congressional Printer, contrary to law, prints the speeches of members of Congress. That is not contrary to law, but it is an express compliance with law. The memorialists evidently suppose that these speeches which are printed for members of Congress are printed at the public cost. I need not inform you, sir, that the very creditable punctuality with which the bills come in to us for those speeches, if they are any evidence of the way in which the Government Printer does his other work, shows that he looks out sharply for the public interest. The memorialists evidently suppose that these speeches are printed at the public expense to be distributed for our convenience. As every Senator knows, we pay for them ourselves at cost, and 10 per cent. in addition, as provided by law.

The memorialists have also brought to the attention of the committee two other matters. They say that the eight-hour law has had a damaging effect upon the printing business in this city. They also say that the prices of the Government printing are practically controlled by the men who perform the work; that there is in this city a typographical society composed entirely of the employés, who, without consulting the employers, fix the prices of printing as they see fit, and have fixed them, as the memorialists allege, at from 30 to 50 per cent. higher than anywhere else.

The law of Congress did once require the Congressional Printer to pay the same prices that were paid in private establishments in the city. That law has been repealed; but the memorialists allege, and the Congressional Printer in a reply to their letter admits, that the force of the society is so strong that, although the law compelling him to adopt the prices that are paid by private establishments here is repealed, yet he has been obliged to do it. The memorialists say that more than half the members of this society belong to the Government Printing Office, so that when the society meets and the proposition is made to increase the rate of wages, although those who are employed in private establishments may not want to do it, they can be voted down by those who are employed at the Government establishments, they being the majority of all the printers here. They therefore fix the rate. That rate being fixed, the private establishments are obliged to submit to it, or else their printers all leave them; and the private establishments having submitted to it, then the Government Printer must pay the same rate.

These are the allegations which the memorialists make. The cost of type-setting since I have been connected with this committee has increased I think from about twenty-six cents an hour to fifty cents an hour, and the amount of work has been increased by putting upon the Government Office all the printing of the blanks and all the blank-books of the Treasury and all the other Executive Departments. The committee report a bill which I ask to have printed with the report.

The bill (S. No. 689) to further regulate the public printing was read and passed to the second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the bill be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to cause all work in the Government Printing Office to be executed in the best and most economical manner for the interests of the Government, and it shall not be lawful for him to pay higher prices for labor than the average of the prices that are paid in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore for similar labor.

SEC. 2. That the Congressional Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, shall have authority to cause any printing and binding that he is lawfully directed to execute, to be done by private contract wherever he shall find it for the interest and convenience of the Government so to do. The Congressional Printer shall state in his annual report all contracts so entered into during the preceding year, the names of the parties thereto, the prices paid, the manner in which the work has been performed, and the advantage or disadvantage to the Government.

SEC. 3. That the Congressional Printer shall, on the second Monday of December of each year, submit to the Joint Committee on Printing a detailed list of prices for the printing and binding for the Executive Departments and the judiciary during the coming year, which list of prices, when approved by the Joint Committee on Printing, shall be used in charging the work done for the Executive Departments and the judiciary during the ensuing year.

SEC. 4. That from and after the close of the present fiscal year the Congressional Printer shall print no records of cases pending in the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court unless the United States shall be appellant or plaintiff in error therein; but in cases wherein the United States is not appellant or plaintiff in error the record shall be printed under the direction of the court at the cost of the parties bringing such record into court, which costs in the Supreme Court shall be taxed as any other costs in the case.

ARMS FOR SETTLERS IN NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 499) to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the State of Nebraska; the consideration of which was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the question pending is on the amendment submitted by myself to that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator is right. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending amendment is after the word "Nebraska," in line 7, to insert "and the same number of muskets and cartridges to be forwarded to and placed at the disposal of the governor of the State of Kansas;" and in lines 8 and 9 to change the word "State" to "States."

Mr. LOGAN. If there is no objection by the Senate I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CONKLING. I see the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] is absent for a moment from the Chamber, and I think he has an amendment or some suggestion to make.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I move that the bill lie over for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid aside by general consent if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Not losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection, if the bill does not lose its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it be laid aside by unanimous consent it will not lose its place. Such will be the understanding.

LORD ELLIOT'S MISSION TO SPAIN IN 1835.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I have been requested to present for the Senate library some unpublished documents affording a suggestive precedent. These are the official papers of Lord Elliot's (since Earl St. Germans) mission to Spain in the spring of 1835, at the beginning of the Carlist war in the Basque provinces, where, history repeating itself now, more than an average generation afterward, another Carlist war is raging.

The facts are briefly these: Before the death of King Ferdinand II, of Spain, he had married in his old age a sister of the King of Naples, nicknamed King Bomba, from his bombarding his own capital, who was finally expelled by Garibaldi. This was Queen Christina, the mother of Queen Isabella. The law of succession in Spain was the salic law, by which females were excluded from the throne. Queen Christina caused the King to convene the Cortes; and through the inducement of giving to Spain a constitutional government obtained the formal abrogation of that law, the declaration that her daughter, on the King's demise, should succeed to the throne under the title of Isabella II, and that she, during her daughter's minority, should be Regent.

King Ferdinand had a brother, Don Carlos, the grandfather of the Don Carlos now contending for his claims and in his right. The claim was that the abrogation of the salic law could have no retroactive effect, whatever it might in the future, and hence could not affect his right to the throne. He made a formal protest, and retired to Portugal. Ferdinand died soon after. Isabella was proclaimed queen, and Queen Christina regent. About the middle of 1834 the inhabitants of the Basque provinces rose under the famous Zumal-acarregui, and Don Carlos joined them, assuming the title of Charles V. In the war that ensued no quarter was given on either side, each party treating the other as rebels, until Lord Elliot went out on his mission of mercy, and succeeded in inducing both parties to sign a convention, by which all captives taken in arms were in future to be treated as prisoners of war. This was in April, 1835, the war having then lasted about nine months, the prisoners shot in cold blood numbering at least two thousand.

The war terminated on the 31st August, 1839, or four and a half years afterward. After the Elliot convention no prisoners of war were shot, and we may assume that from ten to twelve thousand lives were saved by this humane intervention, from the fact that the war lasted six times as long after the convention as it had existed before it. And considering that the war spread over a much larger extent of country and greater numbers were engaged, it is probable that from thirty to fifty thousand lives were thus saved.

Few diplomatists can console themselves in the decline of life on such humanitarian success having crowned their efforts, and it is only justice to add that, though then a young man, the skill and discretion with which he executed his seemingly hopeless mission entitle him to the gratitude of the civilized world.

The British Government was then under treaty obligations never to recognize Don Carlos, nor permit the intervention of other powers in his favor, and to do all they could to prevent any military or material aid from reaching him.

By a change in the cabinet, the Duke of Wellington having succeeded Lord Palmerston, the former commissioned Lord Elliot to mediate between the contending parties, to urge on them the necessity of making some arrangement which should put an end to the mode of warfare which had excited "the most painful sensations through Europe." Lord Elliot was at the same time instructed frankly to inform Don Carlos and his generals that the British cabinet was bound by the treaty before mentioned, and that they must entertain no hope of a change in the policy of the Government.

The papers relating to this negotiation have never been published, but were sent by Earl St. Germans to General C. F. Henningsen, of Washington, whom he had known as an officer in the Carlist army, on the condition that they should not be published, because some of them, though the least important, he considered to be the property of the British government; but with permission to place one copy in the library of General Albert Pike, and one copy to be presented to the Senate of the United States for its library by any Senator whom Messrs. Pike and Henningsen might request to do so. At their request I make this presentation. The copy in General Pike's library, which I have examined, is authenticated by an autograph letter from Earl St. Germans. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate accept the unpublished papers presented by Earl St. Germans relating to his mission of mercy to the kingdom of Spain during the Carlist war in 1835, and that the same be deposited in the library of the Senate for inspection, but not for publication.

Mr. HOWE. Will it not be equally satisfactory to my colleague to have these papers deposited in the Library of Congress?

Mr. CARPENTER. I have simply complied with the request made to me by asking that they be deposited in the Senate library. I suppose, however, there is no objection to depositing them in the Congressional Library.

Mr. HOWE. I understand publication is refused.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, sir. I move, then, to amend the resolution by inserting "Library of Congress" instead of "the library of the Senate."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

ALBERT ROSS.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 1942, a private bill, which I am requested to bring before the Senate owing to the fact that the officer concerned in it I believe expects to be ordered away by the 10th of May next, and there is necessity for action upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. INGALLS. Under the understanding which was had a moment ago, as the Senator from Maine is now in his seat, the bill that was laid aside for him to speak upon I suppose will now be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires no vote. It comes up of itself, having been laid aside informally.

Mr. SCOTT. If this gives rise to the slightest debate, I will not ask that it be considered. I have no doubt that it will pass without objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I am willing the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania shall be acted upon if it gives rise to no debate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1942) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Albert Ross to the active list of the Navy.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to order Master Albert Ross, now on the retired list, to duty on board of a cruising vessel of war, and to have duty pay and allowances; and if, at the expiration of one year's sea service, he is reported upon as physically qualified for promotion, to order him before the usual examining board for promotion, and, if he is found qualified, the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint him a lieutenant on the active list, next below Lieutenant Edwin S. Jacob: Provided, That he shall not receive any extra pay for the time he was on the retired list, and not on active duty, prior to his restoration under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to employ a retired officer at sea, and, if physically and professionally qualified to perform his duties, the President is authorized to restore him to the active list.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 11th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith;

An act (S. No. 316) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Thompson;

An act (S. No. 217) for the relief of Julia A. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana;

An act (S. No. 361) granting a pension to Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry;

An act (S. No. 387) granting a pension to Captain Benjamin Farley, Company C, Fifth Indiana Cavalry;

An act (S. No. 518) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Skinner;

An act (S. No. 548) granting a pension to Christiana Bailey; and

An act (S. No. 566) granting a pension to Lucinda Schrum, widow of Jacob Schrum, late of Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 310) for the relief of W. W. Elliott.

ARMS FOR SETTLERS IN NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. No. 499) to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the State of Nebraska, which was laid aside informally, will now be resumed by the Senate.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer the following amendment to the bill to come in at the close of line 8, after the word "raids:"

And for distribution among Indians who are exposed to intrusion and encroachment by white settlers.

This bill proposes to distribute arms among settlers on our borders that they may use them for home defense against Indians. It appears to me that the Indians are as much exposed to intrusion and to injury as the whites, and that there is as great a necessity for their having means of self-defense as for any other class of men on our border; and I do not know of any reason why we should place arms in the hands of settlers for self-defense any more than we should place them in the hands of men upon whom they would intrude.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This bill strikes me as being of rather a novel character; and though the object of the bill may be well enough, that is to say, it may be well that there should be protection against Indian raids on the border, still the distribution of arms to private citizens is certainly an anomaly in the history of defense. In the history of police regulations or in the history of the art of defense, I think the Senate will agree that the distribution of arms by the Government of the United States to the governors of the States to be delivered to individuals for general defense would be extremely exceptional and questionable. This proposition is to instruct the Secretary of War to deliver two thousand rifles of approved character to the governor of Nebraska, and as many more to the governor of Kansas. For what purpose? "For distribution among the settlers of the exposed localities in said States for home defense against Indian raids." On what principle is that justified at all? These arms are to be handed over to the governors of the States to be delivered to settlers in exposed localities to defend themselves and their homes against Indian raids. In what relation does the Government of the United States place itself to the citizens of Nebraska and Kansas by such an act as that? How does the Government of the United States show its authority in the protection of individuals or of States? Does the Government of the United States ever distribute arms to private individuals to be used according to their discretion either for assault or defense? Why, Mr. President, the Government of the United States, when it acts at all, acts by authorized authority. When it undertakes to exercise military authority, either as a military power or as a police force, it does it by organized authority.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. The other day the Committee on Appropriations reduced the Army, I understand, down to twenty-five thousand, leaving as I believe an entirely inadequate force to protect the frontier. I suppose that having been done as a matter of economy, this is the supplement to it. I take it the Senator himself, who is the father of that measure, certainly ought not to object to this volunteer warfare if we are not to have the Army to protect the frontiers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That may be a very good criticism on what we did the other day, but I do not think it is a very suggestive answer to what I am arguing, certainly not a very striking answer considering the logic of my friend and his eminence in the law.

Mr. CARPENTER. If we are to economize by reducing the Army or abolishing the Army, we must have some means of protecting the frontier. Whether this is the cheaper or better way, I doubt; but I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has driven us to this necessity. He will not give us the Army, and he says we shall not defend ourselves.

Mr. WEST. We did not reduce the Army.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I want to know how my friend from Louisiana got all the glory he claimed for saving so many millions by not appropriating to put the Army up to the standard fixed by law?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I may make the same reply to my honorable friend from Wisconsin: his suggestion does not touch the point, nor was that the object. It was to create a diversion. The fact is we did not reduce the Army. The fact is that we authorized the keeping of the Army at twenty-five thousand, and it has not been above that point for the last two years. That is the fact. The Army, therefore, to-day is just as efficient as it has been for the last two years. It may be, so far as anything we have done is concerned, just as efficient for the next year as it was the last year, because it has not numerically exceeded twenty-five thousand men for the last two years, and we say now, and only say, that it shall not exceed that, rank and file, for the next fiscal year.

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend knows very well that an army never was and never can be kept up to the number fixed by law. It will always be between four and five thousand below that. Therefore when you reduce the standard from thirty thousand down to twenty-five thousand, or from twenty-five thousand down to twenty thousand, you know that you are in fact making the force three or four thousand below the maximum.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does not my honorable friend know that we did not do any such thing as that?

Mr. CARPENTER. I know you claimed great credit for having reduced the appropriation which would keep the Army up to the standard.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend does not know any such thing in regard to the Committee on Appropriations; and we did not do any such thing, and my honorable friend, who presides over the Senate and puts the questions, does not know that fact; and yet he undertakes to criticise the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for what he did not do or attempt to do.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say that the maximum number was thirty thousand soldiers; and now under the law as the Appropriation Committee have had it passed it is limited to twenty-five thousand. That is the only difference.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. It cannot exceed by recruiting twenty-five thousand according to your bill now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Precisely. That provision is simply this, that recruiting shall not go on so that the rank and file shall exceed twenty-five thousand.

Mr. CARPENTER. Before that it was thirty thousand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Before that the extreme limit of the Army was twenty-five thousand.

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend will pardon a single suggestion. If the Army is to be got up from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand, as it cannot be done by enlistments, it must be by births. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Enlistment goes on precisely as before; but it cannot go on beyond twenty-five thousand men. That is the real effect of it. What I was observing was that here is an attempt for the distribution of arms by the Government of the United States to individuals. We do not do such a thing as that, nor is it safe to do such a thing. Why the necessity for this? Why does the governor of Kansas or why do the Senators from Nebraska or from Kansas find it necessary to ask the Government of the United States to distribute arms to individuals, to settlers on the frontier? I can conceive of no reason in the world except that they have not an organized militia; and I am told that is the fact. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to say that neither of these States has an organized militia. That may be. The absence of a militia may create a necessity for this extraordinary proposition; but I do not think the Congress of the United States can afford to do that. I do not believe that there is a condition of things on the borders, in Kansas or in Nebraska, which would make it a prudent thing either for the Government of the United States or for the government of either of those States to put into the hands of settlers on the extreme borders arms for the express purpose of defending their homes or defending themselves against Indian raids. You inevitably invite a collision, and in a certain sense you authorize these people to defend themselves, they themselves being judges of the necessity of the case. I submit if the Government of the United States undertakes to do that thing and a collision does come, we are responsible for arming those people and giving them the discretion of judging of the necessities under which they may use the arms. You certainly to that extent authorize the use of these arms. There ought to be no occasion——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, which is the unfinished business—the territorial railroad bill.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. We have about got through with the discussion on the railroad bill, I think, and I should like to have a vote on it. I do not think it will occupy more than a few minutes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I designed to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for a new election in Louisiana; but if the Senator from Nevada desires to finish this railroad bill, I will wait until that is done and then I will make the motion.

Mr. TIPTON. Does the bill as to arms remain before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill just under discussion comes up in the morning hour to-morrow, I suppose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Calendar should be called. It stands at the head of the Calendar, and when the Calendar is called it comes up, but not necessarily as unfinished business.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask leave to offer an amendment which I propose hereafter to offer as a substitute for the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

A bill (H. R. No. 2124) authorizing the changing of the name of the steamer Fannie Lehr.

A bill (H. R. No. 912) to provide for the inspection of the disbursements of appropriations made by officers of the Army.

A bill (H. R. No. 911) to relinquish the title of the United States in certain real estate near Columbia, Tennessee, to Rose Hill Cemetery; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the modification which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] asked unanimous consent to make to the amendment already adopted on his motion. The modification will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. When the bill was last under consideration the following amendment was made to the twentieth section of the amendment of the Committee on Railroads:

Strike out the words, "Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of such corporations, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act," and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act; and whenever the Territories, or any part thereof, in which the said railroad is located, shall be admitted into the Union as States, the Legislatures of said States may at any time add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act so far as relates to such railroad, or any part thereof, which shall be within the territory of said State.

It was proposed to modify that so as to make it read:

That Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act; and whenever any Territory, or part thereof, in which the said railroad is located, shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the Legislature of any such State may at any time add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act so far as relates to such railroad, or any part thereof, which shall be within the territory of said State.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been adopted, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] asks unanimous consent to substitute the modification which has just been read for the original amendment adopted. Is there objection to that?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to challenge the statement of the Chair that the amendment was adopted. If adopted at all, it was adopted by a practice which I do not think prevails in the Senate. The Chair announced that if there was no objection the amendment would be agreed to. I rose immediately and addressed the Chair in regard to it, calling attention to it; and, although in that technical sense it was adopted, I did not understand at the time that I was precluded, because I rose instantly on the announcement of the Chair, no vote having been taken, but it having been said that the amendment would be adopted if there was no objection. But if it be so, I move to reconsider in order to have the Senate decide upon the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Journal records the adoption of the original amendment. The motion of the Senator from New York to reconsider, therefore, is the only way to accomplish his object.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I move to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the vote by which the amendment was adopted be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the original amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, to which he offers the amendment just read as a substitute.

Mr. CONKLING. Now he has a right to modify his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire as modified.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask that the amendment, as modified, be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act; and whenever any Territory, or part thereof, in which the said railroad is located, shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the Legislature of any such State may at any time add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act so far as relates to such railroad, or any part thereof, which shall be within the territory of said State.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON. I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate to the particular language of the amendment which authorizes a Legislature to repeal an act of Congress. It seems to me that that cannot be done. I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to that particular clause of his amendment which if adopted would authorize the Legislature of a State to repeal or amend an act of Congress. I should like to know whether it would not have that effect.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not understand that this amendment would have any such effect as the Senator from Arkansas anticipates. I do understand that all States in which railroads are located, where those railroads do not go out of the State, where they are within the limits of the State, should be under the control of the State when the State comes into the Union. They should be under the control of the State for purposes of taxation and for other purposes. Corporations are merely creatures of law. They are not natural, but artificial persons; and they are created for the public good; and the Legislature of that State in which they are located, when it is convinced that the public good requires the amendment, alteration, or repeal of the charter of any railroad company, should have the power to so amend, alter, or repeal it as to promote the public good. Now, unless this power is given them by this amendment, it will be impossible for them to so amend, alter, or repeal the charter of a company incorporated under this act.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I consider this amendment to be necessary so that Congress may have power to alter, amend, or repeal this charter when the public good requires it. In my judgment that provision in the tenth line of the twentieth section, beginning "Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of such corporations, alter or amend," will prevent Congress from making any amendment of this charter so as to affect the rights of those claiming under it, no matter how much it may be for the public good to amend the charter. This clause in the twentieth section takes away all power of Congress which shall affect the rights of those who hold the charter, the rights of the corporation.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that I believe there is no objection to his amendment so far as it relates to the power of Congress. The question is then whether, if parties construct a railroad through a Territory that becomes a State, that future State will have the right to repeal the act?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The State should have the right to repeal the act in some cases. Suppose, for instance, that a railroad is built in one of the Territories from one county to another in that Territory. That Territory is admitted into the Union as a State. Should not the Legislature of that State have the right and the power to change, alter, and amend that charter when the public good of the people of that State requires it to be done?

Mr. STEWART. There is no objection to that language.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Why should they come to Congress to ask for that? Why should Congress have any power over a railroad in a State, except so far as the running of that railroad and its existence may affect the rights of people in other States and the matter of internal commerce between the States? It should not. And, Mr. President, this amendment of mine does not take away from Congress its constitutional right to legislate regarding railroads chartered under this act whenever the interests of the people of other States require it and whenever Congress can act under the provisions of the Constitution in respect to railroads running through two or more States. That is all the right that Congress should retain after the States are admitted into the Union, and all the right that it is necessary for Congress to retain, and that right Congress will not be deprived of by the amendment which I propose.

Mr. STEWART. I do not propose to prolong the discussion on any point; but I simply suggest that this is not exactly in harmony with the bill which has passed the House of Representatives, providing that Congress shall exercise authority by law over railroads in the States. I do not care about that; but I am afraid the people of the Territories will be unable to build railroads with this clause in the bill that the future State may repeal the act. I do not think the power would ever be exercised; but putting that in the charter I am afraid would prevent men from getting money to build a road. However, I do not care about discussing it; I would rather have the vote taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that there is one practical difficulty that the Senator from New Hampshire might avoid by a simple amendment. Suppose a railroad has been chartered and built by money furnished by non-residents in a Territory of the United States under an act of Congress, and subsequently a State government should be formed over this Territory. It is manifest that the property of this railroad ought not to be subject to hostile legislation, unless it be legislation in harmony with the general laws of the State applicable to all railroads. If a railroad is in existence when a State is formed, it ought not to be singled out for hostile legislation in favor of new lines of railroad organized, or to be organized, by the State. If a railroad were in existence in a State, the State Legislature would have no right to change the charter, to change the law of its organization, or to repeal the charter so as to affect the contract, unless that right were reserved in the act incorporating the company.

It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire is entirely too broad, that any prudent man would be deterred from investing in a railroad company when he is not only subject to the power of Congress, but is also subject to the power of the State government formed after his rights were fixed. He would not be willing to risk his property to be subject to hostile legislation by a State government formed after his rights had accrued, unless that legislation was by general law applicable to all railroads in that State. Now I should be very willing to vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire if he would modify it so that it should read in this way:

The Legislature of any State may, by general legislation applicable to all railroad companies in said State, at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. CARPENTER. That will do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should have no objection to it then, so that any amendment made to this particular law or act of incorporation granted by Congress should also be applicable to all railroads in the State, and that one particular railroad should not be singled out for hostile legislation.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I have no objection to that, and will accept the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will put it in form and send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The Senator from Ohio offers a modification which the Senator from New Hampshire accepts. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, if amended as proposed, will read:

Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act; and whenever any Territory, or any part thereof, in which the said railroad is located, shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the Legislature of any such State may, by general legislation applicable to all railroad companies in said State, at any time, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act, so far as relates to such railroad, or any part thereof, which shall be within the territory of said State.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I suppose if this amendment has any force at all, in case it becomes a law, if, for instance, the Territory of Colorado should be admitted into the Union and become a State, then under the provision of this amendment the Legislature of that State can amend, alter, or repeal this act of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. By general law applicable to all the railroad companies in the State. There is no practical danger; but there is great danger in singling out a company for special legislation.

Mr. CLAYTON. Do you not give the power to the Legislature of a State that has no existence now, but may exist hereafter, to repeal the act of Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. This provision is part of the contract; there is no difficulty in that.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator thinks there is no difficulty, I shall not object to it.

Mr. BAYARD. Unless I misunderstood the Senator from Ohio, it is not simply the power of amending this charter by general law, but it is the power of amending any charter by a special law, which is reserved to the Legislature.

Mr. STEWART. That is reserved to Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a general clause giving the sovereignty of the State that control over these incorporations which the policy of almost every State in the Union reserves to itself at the present time, simply enabling the States, which hereafter are to be carved out of this vast territory and become members of the Union, to have the same control over the corporations within their midst as is now given by the policy of the States to corporations in the existing States. That is the object of this amendment, which is that the States hereafter to be created in this Union shall not have less power over these incorporations than if they had been created by the laws of existing States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only say that this amendment is in harmony with the laws of a great many States, and I think a majority of the States. The constitution of Ohio forbids the passage of any special acts, and acts relating to railroads and all other subjects must be of a general character. This amendment simply authorizes the States by general laws to regulate this particular railroad, together with all other railroads of the State, but denies the power to single out a particular railroad for hostile legislation. That is in harmony with the laws of the States.

Mr. BAYARD. One railroad may have forfeited its charter, it may have perverted the objects of granting the franchise, so that you desire to punish it and recall the franchise. That would apply to a delinquent company, and not to those who had not sinned. The power will be a general power, but it is to be exercised by special law. The power is the broad power of revoking a charter for cause. It is that power we wish to maintain in new States when they shall come into existence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state to the Senator from Delaware that that power would be retained if the law was general. If any railroad should do a certain act amounting to a forfeiture, it might be condemned by judicial or other proceedings, and there is no difficulty in dealing with a case of that kind by a general law, but this habit of special legislation is a vicious one, and ought never to be tolerated, it seems to me, in any case.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator mean the general power of revocation?

Mr. SHERMAN. The power of revocation as to a particular corporation. The laws ought to be general, so that all corporations and all persons may stand on the same footing precisely. The law ought to apply to all, and no State ought to have the power to revoke a railroad or any other charter except for cause specified by general law, and if the court should then decide that that particular railroad has come within the provisions of that law, as a matter of course the judiciary ought to enforce the general law; but I would not give to any Legislature in the country, especially the Legislature of a State, the power to single out a particular corporation or a particular individual and make laws applicable to that individual alone.

Mr. BAYARD. The difference between the honorable Senator and myself is that I would give no corporation the power to live in a State except at the pleasure of the Legislature of that State. The power of revocation is one that ought to be retained in the sovereignty of the people, the contract to be maintained so long as it is kept in good faith and for public uses. The original grant of this franchise is for public benefit, and whenever public benefit dictates its revocation that revocation should take place. It is not a question of hardship at all; there would be always good faith, there would always be the question of contract; but the State must be the sovereign, it must be the judge, and its own judge, as to whether the public policy of that State demands the continuance of a corporation or its cessation.

That is why, in dealing with these embryo States, I think we should be particularly careful not to place beyond the power of future Legislatures a condition of things which they cannot grapple with and control for their own benefit. We are not creating railroads for the benefit of railroad companies; we are creating railroads for the benefit of the public. The State grants a portion of its power, for its own uses, in trust to certain individuals, not to benefit those individuals, but to benefit the public. That is the underlying theory by which all grants of public powers are to be justified; and if it does not exist, then there is no right to grant public property for private use, whether it takes the shape of a railroad company or whether it takes the shape of being for my individual benefit.

Mr. PRATT. I will inquire whether the amendment is not divisible; whether it does not contain two propositions, and if so whether we are not entitled to a separate vote on each proposition? The first proposition is that Congress shall have the power of repealing or amending the charter at its pleasure, and the second is that the States to be formed out of the Territories traversed by the railroads may exercise the same power. If the question be divisible I should like to have it divided, so that the sense of the Senate may be taken on each proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is a motion to strike out and insert. That being the state of the case it is not divisible.

Mr. CLAYTON. Was the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio accepted by the Senator from New Hampshire?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will it be in order now to move to strike out that portion of the amendment which gives the States the power in the future to amend or repeal this act?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be in order?

Mr. CLAYTON. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves to strike out a portion of the amendment, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Legislature of any such State may, by general legislation applicable to all railroad companies in said State, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act, so far as relates to such railroad, or any part thereof, which shall be within the territory of said State.

Mr. CLAYTON. How will the amendment then read?

The CHIEF CLERK. It will read, if thus amended:

Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to strike out a part of the words proposed to be inserted by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended, to strike out certain words and insert other words.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the following words:

Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of such corporations, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Congress may at any time, when in their opinion the public good requires it, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. CONKLING. That strikes out everything touching the rights of the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. The whole substance of the original amendment having been stricken out, I feel no further interest in having the yeas and nays; and if there be no objection I will withdraw the demand for them.

Mr. MORTON. I do not see any difference between the substitute and the original section. I think they are the same thing now. We might as well let the original language stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order for the yeas and nays will be rescinded if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to offer an amendment, provided there is no similar provision in the bill already. I have not a copy of the bill before me. I will inquire of the chairman who reported it whether there is any provision in the bill making stockholders personally responsible for labor done in the construction of the railroad after the assets of the corporation have been exhausted.

Mr. STEWART. There is nothing in the bill on that subject.

Mr. PRATT. Then I offer the following amendment as a new section:

The stockholders shall be individually liable for all labor done in the construction of said road after the assets of the corporation are exhausted.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that is necessary. It will simply be an embarrassment to those who want to build a road. Nobody will be able to build if you keep piling on these embarrassments. There is no danger of the labor not being paid for; you cannot proceed far with a railroad without paying the laborers; you will prevent the building of all railroads by piling so many things on the charter. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. PRATT. The amendment is just, and ought to vindicate itself without a single word from me. What is the proposition? It is simply that men who do the work in building the road shall under all circumstances be paid for their work, and if the assets of the corporation are not sufficient to pay them, if the assets of the corporation are exhausted otherwise, that the corporators and stockholders shall be personally responsible. That is the whole of it.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I think the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is just, and hope it will be adopted; and perhaps it may be useful in this connection to glance at some features of the bill. This bill already permits any five persons, no matter whether they are citizens of the United States or not as the bill was originally introduced—but it is now amended so that they must be citizens of the United States—to exercise the right of eminent domain and destroy the title to his property of any citizen in any of the Territories of the United States except the Indian Territory.

My friend, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] is very much opposed to special legislation; he likes general legislation. This is general legislation, we are told. The work done in making the highways and by-roads through the Kingdom of England by the overseers of the highway is looked to by the humblest county authorities, so that the matter is brought home close to the people. When a road is to be made, because it takes the use of private land over which to put it, the application is made to the county court, the local court; the fellow-citizens of him whose property is taken must apply for the road and must prove, if that be necessary, before a jury, that it will be useful. That power here is to be taken from the people and given to the Congress of the United States, and then the law by which it is done must be general; that is, every citizen of this land can exercise this power. Mr. President, there never was such a delusion as has been passed over the minds of the people of this country and from which they will soon awaken, than when they are told that because you call such acts general laws they make things freer. They are in derogation of common right. They are a violation of the free tenures of this land which we derive from our forefathers. There is no tenure, however base, that is not preferable to a tenure that a citizen of the Territories holds his lands by under such a system as this. They cannot hold land in allodium; they cannot hold it in free or common socage. Let them hold it by base service, but let it be a service that is certain. Let it be a tenure under which they cannot be deprived of it by any power in this country except due process of law. Better the worst form of tyranny that ever existed in any country than the tyranny that a man's title to his property, for the protection of which laws were created, for the protection of which governments were made, should be subject to any other man who chooses to blackmail him.

Under this bill any five men in the city of New York, without any capital whatever, can go into any Territory of the United States and prospect a line of road across a man's land and blackmail him to the extent of ruining him, perhaps. Then these persons may be induced by large payments of money to leave their projected route, and any other five men may follow in their footsteps; and the fact that a man has once permitted himself to buy off the first party invites others until his land becomes to him burdensome. And now objection is made by the promoters of this bill to requiring the men who do this even to be responsible in their own pockets for the exercise of the great governmental power of eminent domain. Mr. President, when you pass a law that is in derogation of common right; when you deprive any individual in this country from exercising any trade in the community, from killing beef, from making shoes, from vending any article, you are then guilty of special legislation; what has so wisely been held odious in all time, what has been called monopoly. It is in derogation of common right, because what is free and common to all and ought to be so by the general laws and principle of a free government, you make special to certain individuals. That is what is odious; that is what the people dislike. But here we are dealing with the power to take private property for public use upon just compensation—a power so carefully guarded by the Constitution of your country—and now you take that power and commit it to the whole world at large, without knowing who your trustees are, without reposing that special trust and confidence (which is the theory of every railroad charter that ever has been granted by a State) in the individuals to whom the power is granted; and you make agents, for the exercise of the sovereign power that the people have committed to you, of Tom, Dick, and Harry, or any persons who choose to combine together and tell those persons and tell the people whose land they are going to take that they need have no pecuniary responsibility at all, that this creature that the Congress of the United States is creating is to protect and cover them up. It is not a natural person; it is an artificial person, with no responsibility whatever; and you grant them land through the public domain free, you send them all through your own land, and then you cover them up and clothe them with the sovereign power to take, under the plea that it is for a public purpose, from the individual citizen the property which he may have bought or you may heretofore have granted him for money yourself.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STOCKTON. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Does he think the people in the Territories should have the right to build railroads at all?

Mr. STOCKTON. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask one or two more questions. Does he think that they have a right to build railroads at all in the Territories?

Mr. STOCKTON. I will answer that in a moment.

Mr. STEWART. Will not the Senator have a little conversation with me now? Perhaps I may obviate his objections.

Mr. STOCKTON. I tried to have a conversation with the Senator on a previous occasion, but it seemed to annoy him so much that I had to desist.

Mr. STEWART. When the Senator answers that question I will ask him two or three more.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do think the Congress of the United States has the power to authorize the people of a Territory to make railroads. I think, and I was just going to say, that the wiser and the better plan is to let them make those roads themselves, because that is bringing the power closer to the people, who know their own necessities, know their own wants, and is in conformity with the universal practice in England and this country in reference to making highways and roads.

Mr. STEWART. Then the Senator would authorize the territorial Legislatures to grant these charters?

Mr. STOCKTON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. They have that power now, given by express act of Congress.

Mr. STOCKTON. If they have the power now, it is not necessary for us to authorize them to exercise it.

Mr. MORTON. The act of 1872 authorizes them to pass general laws of incorporation for railroads. The Senator from Nevada was mistaken in his remark on Friday on that subject. I have the act here. In 1872 we re-enacted the law which was repealed by the act to which he referred.

Mr. STEWART. I was not aware of that fact. It is a dangerous thing, however.

Mr. STOCKTON. I presume the object of the Senator from Nevada is to get the bill through as quick as he can. I have a few words to say, and if he will let me finish them I will not interfere with the passage of the bill any further than by my vote.

Mr. STEWART. All right.

Mr. STOCKTON. If the Senator interrupts me he might lead me into a long discussion. I had nearly concluded; I had just arrived at the point of saying what I would do. As all the States in this country have exercised this privilege within their own borders, as Congress has never yet asserted the right to make railroads within the States without their consent, and as these Territories propose hereafter to come in as States, and as it has been shown by the amendments offered by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Delaware that this question is forced upon you as to the rights of the future States to be formed in these Territories, and as in the debate already the Indian question has been presented, and as all the technicalities in reference to the arrangement of this bill have arisen, I think it has been shown distinctly that this is one of those local powers which are safer and better with the people themselves. There is no reason why it should not be left to the people locally interested in the subject-matter.

There is an additional reason why I suggest this should not be done by a general act of Congress. This is a general committal of the whole power of the Government of the United States to exercise its right of eminent domain in a Territory, providing in a certain way as to the effect it shall have when that Territory becomes a State, and committing that to any five men, without knowing who they are; it is general legislation by those removed from the people concerned, in derogation of common right, and really is, in my humble judgment, an improper use of the trust the people have committed to us. Every time a railroad charter is granted and the power of eminent domain is delegated, you have taken something from the body of the people, you have taken some of their liberty. You have no right to lay a road, whether made of one material or another, except by taking away for the common good individual rights. Government was made to establish those rights. Government was made to protect personal liberty and private property. That was the foundation of all government; and the principles laid down in our Constitution have no object in the world but to protect them against fanaticism, against folly or the nonsense of the hour. There is no necessity for it exercising the power here when so safely exercised, and has been exercised so wholesomely, by the States, our system of internal improvement having been so well developed by private individuals, acting under State charters granted to persons whom they know and in reference to whom they took occasion, having them in their minds when the bill was passed, to see whether they intended faithfully to carry out the objects they had in view. Now, to change the whole of that policy, without any reason at all, I think is a great mistake; and it is a misapplication of terms to call this general, as opposed to special, legislation. It is general legislation in reference to a special power, in derogation of common right, which you are granting to any number of unknown individuals. You might as well say it was special legislation to grant the right of way in one-half of the Territories of the United States to all the railroad companies of the United States or to all the people of the United States. When you come to apply it you must discriminate in reference to what is the thing you are granting. Here you are granting a power which can only be granted on the theory that it is for the public good, that it is a necessary incident to communities to have roads; and any individual, when his property is taken under such a bill, has a right to ask a jury to say whether it is for a public purpose; for you must not lose sight of the principle on which you start.

But I shall not detain the Senator from Nevada from pushing his bill through. I had intended ever since this debate came up to express these views. My main object in rising was to do what I could in the Senate to call the attention of the lawyers of the body to how far we are departing from sound principles under this mistaken delusion, this popular delusion, that because you call a bill a general railroad law you are making railroads freer or cheaper or better, or that you are making them more in accordance with the growing freedom of personal independence It is the reverse.

Mr. STEWART. I rise simply to make one remark. The Senator from New Jersey would allow the Territories to exercise this power when there are only a few people there, thus binding up a Territory and involving it, of which the Territory of Colorado is a good illustration. By means of their legislation there they have involved the counties of that Territory, sparsely settled as they are, over $2,000,000 already. The Territories are the common property of the whole country and it is the duty of Congress to see that they do not get into any such situation. In the Territories where this power has been exercised the legislation is of such a character that it has been a matter of complaint; and the mode of condemning private property is such as is complained of generally. So I might go through the different Territories. Thus legislation in this regard has been most unfortunate. The mere fact that a new Territory should have some of its counties involved to the extent of $2,000,000 for railroad purposes shows the importance of a general law prohibiting them involving themselves in debt at all. This bill prohibits it.

Then if we do not allow the Territories to provide for railroads, somebody must do it. Congress must do it. If Congress does it by particular legislation, special laws, those who can afford to come and lobby bills through, because it takes a good deal of time to get a bill through, will have charters for sale over every important route; they will get special privileges which you will not guard in a special law. A general law is the only fair way to do it.

I have no interest in the bill further than that it is obvious to me that they should have the right to build railroads and have the right to build them in such a way that they do not destroy the Territories by involving them in debt, and that nobody has the right to levy blackmail on bona fide persons who really desire to build railroads. This bill creates no monopoly. The corporators do not acquire lines of railroad unless they build them. There are no exclusive privileges in it. Any party may lay down a track by the side of them. It cannot hurt anybody. The only thing they can do is to build a road with their own money, and I believe it will not be denied that railroads are useful and necessary in that country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Indiana to the very benevolent provision which he is inserting in this general railroad law. According to the phraseology which he has used, it gives the laborer a remedy against the individual stockholder to recover only for the labor which he shall do after the assets of the corporation shall be exhausted! I ask to have the amendment read again to see if I am not correct.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

The stockholders shall be individually liable for all labor done in the construction of said road after the assets of the corporation are exhausted.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. If that be his benevolent intention, I have no objection.

Mr. PRATT. I do not think it bears any such construction as my friend from Pennsylvania thinks it does. I am willing to take it in its present form.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—ayes 10, noes not counted.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend in section 13, line 7, by inserting after the word "the" the words "charter, franchise;" so as to read:

To secure the payment thereof by mortgage or pledge of the charter, franchise, property, and income of such corporation.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

That any charter herein granted shall be revocable by the Legislature of any State which may hereafter be formed out of any Territory or Territories of the United States, and organized and admitted into the Union as a State, within whose limits any such railroad shall, in whole or in part, be found to exist, and shall in all respects be subject to the laws of such State.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be adopted, and I call for the yeas and nays. Let us see whether the Senate will organize a railroad company and then invite the State to repeal the charter.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senate will observe that this amendment is simply giving to these new States powers which are reserved in the constitutions of almost every existing State which has undertaken to deal by general or special law with the subject of incorporation. The present constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, made so acceptable to the people, carried so overwhelmingly by the popular sentiment of that State, received its especial emphasis peculiarly from the features it contained restrictive of corporate powers. It was to curb such powers mainly that the convention which framed the present constitution of that State came together, and all over the constitution as adopted those restrictive provisions, those express reservations of power, are found abundantly. It is the case with almost every other State, certainly with many others which I could enumerate; and I only ask that these new States, with whose destinies we are now dealing in so light and off-hand a manner, may have at least the protection afforded them which the older States have insisted upon for themselves. I am not sorry that the yeas and nays have been called for upon this amendment. It is a just and proper amendment, and I trust the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. MORTON. I am not favorable to this bill; but I want to make just one remark, that if the bill is right in principle, the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware is radically wrong. If it is right for Congress to give five persons the power to create a corporation to build a railroad to run across three or four Territories, it is not right to give to a State after it is organized out of one of these Territories the power to repeal the charter and cut that road in two in the middle and leave the parties who built the road with the two ends and the middle out. That is absurd. If it is right to give the State that power, the bill is wrong. If the bill is right, the amendment is wrong.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state to the Senator my opinion on this subject, and that is that the principle of the bill is wrong and the principle of the amendment is right.

Mr. STEWART. I would have no objection to that part of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire that was stricken out, allowing this to be provided for in the States hereafter formed by general legislation. I would prefer that to having one road singled out to have its charter revoked. If that portion of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire which was stricken out should be substituted for this, I should have no objection.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I did not hear all that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] said just now on this amendment, but I understood him to object to its adoption, because the amendment would allow a State when admitted into the Union to repeal an act of Congress.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there are some cases, and that this is one of those cases, in which that power should be granted to the State. As I said before, a corporation is a mere creature of law. That is particularly the case with a railroad corporation, which is allowed to stand in the place of the Government, and exercise itself and for its own interests the right of eminent domain, the right to take the land of the person without his consent. These corporations are the creatures of law, and created for the public good. The right to take the property of others is granted to them solely because they are public corporations, created for the public good. Now, whenever the public good requires that powers granted expressly or by implication in the charter of any corporation should be withdrawn, some legislative authority should be at hand to do that, to withdraw the rights granted which are against the public interest. My friend, the Senator from Indiana, says that Congress alone should have that right in this case, but after these Territories have been admitted into the Union as States why should not the Legislatures of these States have a right to do with corporations which are solely within their own limits what the public good of those States requires? Can they not judge better than Congress can what the necessities of the public are, what the public good and the public convenience require? Why should Congress reserve the right in the case of new States which in all the old States is exercised by the Legislatures of those States? It strikes me that if, whenever the public good requires an alteration of these charters and a limitation of the powers granted, the people who seek to bring that about must come here to Congress to ask for our legislation, it will lead to a great deal of inconvenience, to a great deal of trouble, and it will be asking and obliging Congress to inform itself in regard to subjects concerning which it will be difficult for members to inform themselves, and upon which the people of the respective States could act through their Legislatures to much better purpose, and with much better knowledge as to what should be done.

I believe that the power to alter these charters, which should be exercised only for the public good of the people wherever the corporation is located, can be judged of much better by that people than it can be by this Congress.

Mr. HAGER. I desire to say a few words upon this measure, inasmuch as it has a bearing upon all the legislation of this character which may be introduced in Congress at this time or at a future period, and it has some bearing upon past legislation.

I have introduced a bill, as I stated the other day, to get the right of way through a portion of the public domain in order to build a railroad from a certain uninhabited portion of California to strike the Central Pacific Road. That is a case of special legislation; and it seems to me that the only question which ought to be considered here is whether it is better to legislate by general law or by special law on a matter of this kind. This bill is a proposed general law to meet all cases of the character to which I have alluded. Special laws are very common. A party wishes to obtain a franchise for a railroad, and he must apply here specially if it affects the public domain. This is intended as a general law to cover all those cases, and is substantially to do away with special legislation; and that is really the question that is presented before the Senate, whether it is more advisable to legislate on matters of this kind by general or by special law. That is the case, as I understand it, before the Senate. In California we are so accustomed to general legislation that there is nothing novel about it to me. There is an inhibition in our constitution against special legislation for any purpose so far as to create a corporation, unless it be for municipal purposes. In that State railroads and all other kinds of corporations are formed under general laws. That was thought so advisable that it was incorporated in the constitution, as it has been in several of the other States.

Now, whether it is advisable to adopt that principle here in congressional legislation is a matter for the Senate. It is proposed now to allow a certain control over this class of legislation by the States hereafter to be formed from these Territories. Has Congress now the power to legislate upon this matter? Unquestionably. To what extent does Congress wish to recognize the right of a limitation in the future by the States? That is the question that comes up on this amendment. Should the States have authority to interfere with that legislation which we may now do and over which we now have the entire control? As I understand it, that is the proposition in the amendment. If that be so, it must necessarily involve the same question whether the legislation be general or special, and it should have arisen heretofore in any legislation that you may have had wherein you have granted privileges or franchises of this kind to railroads. Now, how does it stand in regard to the Union Pacific Railroad? Was there any limitation or restriction in that charter? I have not examined it; I do not know how it is; but if it is not there, why should it be here? If it is necessary that it should be here as a protection to future legislation in the States to protect the rights of citizens there, it ought to have been in that and in any other law heretofore passed by Congress granting railroad franchises or railroad subsidies.

I allude to these matters to show that the same rule which has been applied heretofore should be applied now. I am inclined to think that the States should have the control after they are admitted into the Union, but I would go no further now than to provide that when a State is admitted into the Union in which a railroad may be incorporated under this territorial provision, it shall be subject to the same rules and regulations as if that corporation had been organized in the State after it was admitted as a State. That would be fair and that would be right according to my notions about it.

I merely desired to say that this question is first in regard to the advantages of general legislation over special legislation, and next the same rule that we apply to this general legislation should be applied to the special legislation.

Mr. CLAYTON. I believe, Mr. President, the principle of a general incorporation law is correct, and the suggestion made by the Senator from California carries with it to a certain extent the convictions of my mind that it is correct. Special incorporation laws are obtained by persons coming here to Congress, and hanging around Congress, who are classed as lobbyists. When these special laws are brought before Congress, very little attention is paid to them.

Now, what is the reason that this provision which is offered by the Senator from Delaware was not made to apply to the Union Pacific Railroad? That was a special incorporation chartered to run a railroad through several of the Territories of this Government. Since that company was incorporated States have sprung up on the line of that road—the State of Nebraska, and perhaps the State of Nevada. If it is necessary now to have this provision in this general law to protect all future States, why was it not necessary to have the same provision in the special law incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad? It only goes to show that when you come here with special propositions they do not receive the same attention that a general law of this character does.

It seems to me that the idea of throwing open to organized capital the privilege of applying itself to the construction of railroads throughout the Territories of this Government with the least obstacle that possibly can be thrown in the way ought to be adopted by the Government. I think this country is behind England and Germany and France on this question. England some time since adopted a general railroad law, and I think it has adopted a general law for all joint-stock corporations. France has done the same thing, and Germany has done the same thing. I believe in this doctrine, and I believe the time will come when the principle will be applied to the States as well as to the Territories. There may be, of course, constitutional questions in the way as to applying it to the States; but if those constitutional obstacles cannot be overcome, if they are such as to prevent legislation of this character as to the States, I believe the time will come when the Constitution itself will be so amended as to permit this principle. I believe the principle is correct. I believe that this bill has gone sufficiently into details. I do not think there have been sufficient guards thrown around the stockholders, but the whole question of the abuses of corporations, of the abuses of joint-stock companies, is one that is bound to be thrust upon the attention of Congress, and is one that we shall necessarily be occupied with in the future. I believe it is a great question which we shall have to deal with hereafter.

I would go one step further if my voice would prevail; I would not only vote for a general law for the incorporation of railroads in the Territories, but of all joint-stock companies.

Mr. TIPTON. I do not see the force of the argument that this amendment is to be considered objectionable here because it may not appear in the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad. The General Government to that road made her appropriation of land, and in that road she put her Government bonds. It was right and proper therefore, I suppose, that she should hold a power over that not only in the present, but in the future. But this is simply an act of incorporation for the purpose of establishing a road in the Territories where the Government has the power to pass the act and enforce it, but in which she may have no pecuniary interest at all, either in the territorial condition or in the State.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, it seems very clear, as contemplated in this bill, that we are legislating for posterity. That being the fact, it is necessary that we should be very cautious that all the guards that can be legitimately invoked should be brought to bear for the protection of those that are to be interested in the action of this bill for a century perhaps to come, nay longer for aught I know. Then, in connection with that view, it occurs to me that the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Delaware is legitimate, and one that ought to have favorable consideration in the Senate.

It is objected here that the passage of this bill, which is termed a general bill, will prevent in all future time the annoyance of lobbyists. That is far-fetched in my opinion. The Constitution of the United States guarantees that privilege. A, B, and C, from any of the States of this broad Union, at any time, have a right to come here and through their Senators ask for such and such action on the part of the Congress of the United States. We cannot perfect everything that is desired in guarding against that obtrusion, if it be one. It is like everything else; it is abused; and it is not to be expected that it can be otherwise. Perfection will not be reached at a very early day.

To say the least, in my opinion this bill is premature. I do not think it is necessary at this day that it should be passed. If my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Railroads, should present a bill here, I would not oppose it even if I saw errors in it, except they were very great and very flagrant, indeed. I have the very highest opinion of the committee that he presides over for their ability, purity, &c. They know more about these matters than I do. Therefore I am slow to raise an issue with them. But it might be again said that the amendment was very objectionable; that it would directly prevent the building of roads. Very good; take that view of the question, and I am still satisfied to meet and accept that. Then there is no injury done; and if any associations do organize and go into this experiment at this early period in the Territories they will know what the law is; they will understand what they have to do, and they will thereby be more circumspect, and we may expect that they would act precisely according to the requirements of the law, because if they did not the consequences would be upon them, and they would not be very pleasant ones.

Now, sir, we are told that this is a general bill. In what is it general? It pertains to the public domain of this mighty nation—the Territories of the United States. It is excluded, however, from the States. It does not prevail over the entire Union. It does not prevail over the States that are organized; and therefore it is not general. It is a general special bill, just such a one as is not necessary for the present day. Sufficient it is whenever it is necessary. From any of the public domain—from any one of the Territories, organized or otherwise—if any gentleman or gentlemen make their appearance here, lobbyists or otherwise, and it is ascertained to be a legitimate application, the response will be favorable, and no trouble in the world; and those parties who are interested can always do so. I think it is entirely gratuitous upon the part of the Senate to anticipate their wishes, thereby showing that we are better enabled to know what their interests are than they themselves can possibly be. I think that is going rather rabid; and upon the whole I think it inexpedient. I merely drop these ideas. The amendment I shall vote for.

Mr. HAGER. I propose the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware:

That when a Territory is admitted as a State, such State shall have the same power of control, by legislation and otherwise, over corporations under this act as over corporations in such State.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, at the suggestion of one or two Senators who are interested in the question, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] being entitled to the floor on the bill to which I referred this morning, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock. I speak of course of the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice that I should like to have the sense of the Senate on the question of taking up that bill; because I desire myself to resist the taking up of the Louisiana case. At the same time I am perfectly willing to give way as a matter of courtesy to any Senator who desires to speak upon the subject. I therefore would prefer that the Senator should, in the morning when it is convenient, move to take it up, and let the Senate by a full vote decide whether they will proceed to its consideration or not.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not see how we are any of us to make much of a speech on the subject unless the subject be before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If any Senator desires to make a speech on the general subject, I have no objection to his doing so. I do not wish to interpose against that; but I desire the sense of the Senate to be taken, whenever it is proposed to take up the bill to be acted upon, as to whether we shall consider the Louisiana case this session or not.

Mr. CARPENTER. I presume the bill cannot pass until the Senate has a chance to settle that question. At the same time, it cannot be debated, as I understand, unless the Senate take it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question of taking it up will give the Senate an opportunity of limited debate; but I will state frankly that I am opposed to taking up the Louisiana bill, and I desire to test the sense of the Senate as to whether they wish to consume time in debating the question. Undoubtedly if the bill is taken up, four or five days will be spent upon it, and I think we ought to devote our time to other matters that probably will result in some active legislation.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey is entitled to the floor upon the bill, and is, I understand, prepared to deliver a speech on the subject. I take it for granted the Senate is willing to proceed to the consideration of the bill, after which it can be laid aside of course, if that be the pleasure of the Senate. My own opinion of the question is that if a majority of this Senate are determined to stand by the Kellogg government, right or wrong, elected or not elected, it is very bad policy to have any debate, because I do not think debate would strengthen that view of the case; and as a matter of policy, if that is to be done, I think it should be done in sullen silence; but I submit to my honorable friend from Ohio, that on a subject of such importance it would be remarkable if the Senate should refuse to have it debated and disposed of on its merits. For the Senate to say in advance that they will decide upon this subject without hearing it, that they will dispose of the bill without its being debated, has but one precedent. I recollect in a mock session of the Legislature in the State of Vermont, a great many years ago, held the evening before the adjournment, some wag introduced a resolution to this effect:

Whereas much of the valuable time of this body is taken up in useless debate: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That no subject shall hereafter be debated until the evening after it has passed.

[Laughter.]

Probably the Senator from Ohio has in mind that precedent; there shall be no debate until the Senate disposes of the question on the motion to take it up. The Senator has come here this session with several financial conundrums, and the Senate has spent three or four months in debating them. I think he would have been astonished if the enemies of his plan had proposed to vote him down without a hearing. I think any Senator would be astonished when he produced in good faith a bill upon an important subject, to have another Senator contend that the Senate ought to dispose of the question on the motion to proceed to its consideration. That is to decide it without a hearing.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have a thousand bills upon our Calendar, and the question whether we shall take up particular bills or not is always a question to be decided by the Senate. I need not reply to the observations made by my honorable friend. He has already debated for two or three days this identical question and has expressed his views to the Senate. Now, if he has not been able to convince the Senate that it is important for us to lay aside all the practical legislation of Congress in order to take up this question—that can result, according to my judgment, in no practical good even to the people of Louisiana, in no good even to a section or faction in Louisiana, but in any event in any form in which it may pass will be an injury to the people of Louisiana—certainly we ought to have the right to say whether we will consider it, especially as the Senator cannot get the bill before the Senate except by the will of a majority of the Senate. We ought to say whether or not we will take up the time of the Senate in considering this particular subject rather than in considering other matters of legislation which must have action.

I will not make this point against any Senator who desires to express his views upon the question; but when the subject is taken up for formal action, then I must insist that there are other matters which ought to be acted upon rather than the Louisiana bill, and then the Senate will decide whether we shall proceed with it or not.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me but one word? I understand him to say that he has no objection whatever to debate on this bill, but he does not want the vote taken on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not it precisely. I say I will never deny the courtesy to any Senator who desires to make a speech on any subject on anything from the origin of man to the last revolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To the origin of the last Louisiana government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; if any Senator desires to make a speech I would give him that privilege by common courtesy on whatever subject, whether it was pending before us in the form of a bill or whether it was a question of ancient history. I would give a Senator the right to make a speech at any time.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then my friend is not standing on the point of time that will be consumed in considering this bill, if we can consider the bill in a debate to take it up as well as by discussion in its regular consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. My point is: whenever theSenate have determined by a vote that we will not take action on the Louisiana matter, speeches will not be very abundant.

Mr. CARPENTER. Is not that denying the very courtesy the Senator says he is always willing to grant?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.

Mr. CARPENTER. In other words, the Senator says he will invite Senators to enjoy his courtsey in debating a bill which he gives notice in advance will never be voted on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will never debate a question when it is determined that there shall be no action upon it. There is a kind of mutuality in this courtesy. If a Senator would determine to discuss a question that the Senate had said they would not discuss further, although he might be overruled in that discussion, it would not be courtesy to the party to deny him the right.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then it is as I understood it, and therefore I understand that the Senator's courtesy is merely saying to a Senator, "If you have a mind to outrage propriety we will let you." For that courtesy no one will feel very grateful and probably no one will care to enjoy the privilege on those conditions. But I want to say to my honorable friend from Ohio, that being upon a subject as important as this must be conceded to be, where a State government has been usurped, is held to-day by men who have no pretense of an election, is held by a government organized by the absolute usurpation of a Federal court, I should think it somewhat remarkable if the Senate should refuse to even consider the matter.

Mr. President, I cannot conceal my astonishment at the indifference manifested by Senators on this subject. It may be that I am insane about it; it may be that I have dwelt so long on this subject that I have come to be entirely unsound. I know how a man may become so interested in any one thing that he may be so; but I do not see how any Senator can sit here indifferent upon this subject, because if we are to say in this case that we can grant no relief we shall thereby say that whenever in the future, near or remote, any State government shall be seized by usurpers, seized through force or fraud, Congress will not interfere in the matter; for if the republican party now refuse to interfere in a case where their friends hold the State by the throat, we cannot interfere to release any State from a similar grasp by the democrats. It seems to me that we are now to make and can avoid making the most important precedent that was ever made in this country, so far as regards the institutions of our country in the future. We are placed where not to act is just as much of a precedent as to act; and if we say now with the facts as they appear, or as they are claimed to exist, that Congress can grant no relief, we do in effect say that Congress can grant no relief in any case of usurpation, however flagrant. We say to the lawlessness of the country, "Seize upon State governments where you will and Congress is powerless in the premises."

Mr. President, if this matter can be taken up, discussed, and considered fully; if the Senate shall be of opinion that the usurpations do not exist, as the testimony taken before the committee tends to show; if the Senate shall be convinced that there is no authority in the Government to relieve a State held by usurpers, or for any other reason that this bill ought not to pass, the country will be satisfied. But I do not think the people will be satisfied with less than this.

I was in New Orleans in May last, soon after the Grant Parish massacre, when there was great excitement there and when the President issued his proclamation. In a public speech I was invited to make in New Orleans by people of both political parties, I pledged myself to them that if they would stop violence and submit to the government of Kellogg until Congress met I would do what I could to present their case fully to the consideration of the Senate and to pass a bill for their relief. They have kept their part of the contract. No violence has been committed that I am aware of since that time. I certainly shall keep my word, and although the Senate may vote the bill down, I will perform my agreement by putting it in an attitude which will call for a vote from the Senate upon the merits.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every Senator in the whole body will admit that the Senator from Wisconsin has redeemed his pledge faithfully, eloquently, and ably. No one will gainsay that; but I think it is equally clear, if any one will read not only the newspapers but the indications that we have from persons from Louisiana—and I have also been on the ground in Louisiana and heard from both sides—that a large majority of the people of Louisiana have acquiesced in the existing condition of affairs. It is as plain, as palpable to me as the light of day, that it is wise that they have so acquiesced. They will have an opportunity at the next election in November to redeem their State government if it has fallen into the hands of usurpers. The power will be again restored to them, and I think it is the wisest thing in the world to pass in silence all that has occurred in Louisiana, with the certainty that the people themselves will correct any evils that have been done there.

I sympathize with my friend from Wisconsin, but at the same time I do not believe he is pursuing the course best for the people of the United States or for the people of Louisiana. I believe Congress had better attend to their ordinary legitimate business, leaving matters in Louisiana to right themselves, and they are now being rapidly righted, and at the next election we may probably have a Legislature elected by the consent of the governed, ready to pass laws to suit their wishes without difficulty. The very election law now pending has been passed, perhaps by the general consent of all, and is declared to be a fair law. There is no practical difficulty in the Louisiana matter. If we will let things alone in Louisiana, the popular will as expressed in a legal election will undoubtedly prevail. The only result of this movement now to overthrow the government of Louisiana will be to derange and disorder the condition of affairs there and turn out of office two or three State officers whose terms happen to extend beyond next fall.

Therefore I shall oppose taking up the Louisiana case. At the same time I do not want to prevent anybody from making a speech or to deny any courtesy to any Senator; but when the time comes I hope we shall have the sense of the Senate on the general historical facts known to all, whether it is wise to consume the time of the Senate in a prolonged debate. The question has already been ably presented by both sides, and we are now to determine whether we should not go on with our ordinary business and let all the evils of the past in Louisiana find their remedy in the acquiescence of the people and the remedies that the people themselves shall propose.

Mr. CARPENTER. When the Senator talks about the acquiescence of the people of Louisiana, I am somewhat surprised. What is that acquiescence? The governor of the State, the State authorities, are supposed to have certified to the President that they could not maintain themselves in that State in consequence of the disaffection of the people, and the President has issued his proclamation and stands behind that government to-day. The acquiescence of the people of Louisiana under that government is its submission to the authority of the United States, and that continues to this hour, and troops are now upon the ground, where, if any attempt was made on the part of the people of that State to overthrow that government, those troops would be put instantly into action.

One word as to the election which the Senator from Ohio refers to. We all know how the condition of things was produced in Louisiana. The law was so devised as to authorize the governor to make all the appointments which would control the election. It was therefore in the power of the governor to carry the State either way, just as he pleased. Governor Warmoth having invented the scheme—I suppose he invented it, at all events having profited by it—and got the State completely into his hands, had the grace to repeal it; he had sufficient sense of shame to repeal it by the act of November 20, 1872. This usurping government, which came into power by collusion with a Federal judge, is no sooner established than it re-enacts that law which Warmoth was ashamed of and repealed, and to-morrow, if an election should take place under the State law, Mr. Kellogg could carry that State by twenty or fifty thousand votes, just as he might determine to do.

Mr. MORTON. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is not aware that the last Legislature repealed the act of last winter and that law of 1872, and that that power which was in Governor Warmoth's hands, and which was exercised so injuriously, has been taken out of the hands of the governor entirely?

Mr. CARPENTER. I am not aware of it.

Mr. WEST. You are not aware of many things down there, it seems.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have not been in Louisiana recently, and it is possible such a bill may recently have passed.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to my friend that the act was passed the day before the last one of the session; and I have Governor Kellogg's dispatch now saying that he has signed the act and it is the law of the State.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am very glad of it; that is so much that is decent; but, at the same time, it does not relieve us from our duty in the premises; it does not take away from us the constitutional duty to see to it that that State has a government elected by the people. For two years yet, unless Congress shall interfere, that usurping government will hold that State. This question will be mingled with the difficult questions which may be involved in the next canvass of votes for President and Vice-President.

I will not take more time and do not care to say another word upon the merits of the subject; but it does seem to me that it is little short of madness on the part of Congress to postpone this question and mix it up with the difficulties which may arise on the count of the votes for President. We can settle it now to the satisfaction of all mankind, settle it honestly; have an election there that every man will know and feel is an honest election, and then the matter will be removed from the next presidential contest. I do not speak of the political contest, but I speak of the canvass of the votes in the Hall of Representatives. The vote of Louisiana at the last election was thrown out because this very election from which Mr. Kellogg claims to have derived his rights was void. The casting away of that vote did not change the result, and therefore no one cared about it; but if the result had depended upon counting or not counting the vote of Louisiana, we should have had trouble such as no man can estimate. And it is now proposed to let things drift and to adjourn the question which we might settle now when we are under no temptation to do anything wrong; to adjourn it all and see what will turn up in the next count of votes for President.

Mr. STEWART. I hope we shall go on with the bill which is the regular order. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin has given notice that he will move to take up his bill to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate proceeds by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORTON. A moment further——

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. MORTON. I would say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the danger through which the nation has passed or may pass in regard to counting the votes of Louisiana or other States is not one that Congress can remove by any action. That grows out of a defect in the Constitution of the United States which I hope will some time be removed.

But, Mr. President, the chief disturbing element now in the State of Louisiana is the presence of this bill pending in the Senate. I shall not resist the taking up of the bill; but I do hope that it will be disposed of. As was stated by the Senator from Ohio, I believe that the great body of the people of all parties, I am sure the republican party of Louisiana as a body, and they are conceded to be in the majority in that State, are acquiescing fully in the Kellogg government. I believe I state what will hardly be disputed when I say that the best part of the democratic party, that portion of it which represents wealth, industry, and order in Louisiana, are opposed to any action being taken by Congress to set that government aside. The government of Lonisiana is going on well; and if this bill is taken up for discussion, I shall avail myself of the opportunity to show what has been done by the last Legislature of that State in the way of reforms, and to show that it has been a beneficent Legislature and that Louisiana in her industries, in the value of her property, in her enterprise, is rapidly reviving under the influence of the Kellogg government.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does he in speaking of the beneficent character of their legislation refer to their attempt to repudiate the State debt?

Mr. MORTON. I was not referring to what is called the funding bill. If the question comes up, the Legislature, the governor, the Chamber of Commerce, and the people down there will be ready to speak for themselves in regard to their debt; but aside from that question they have instituted great reforms in the State of Louisiana, and I believe that the action of Congress would be reprobated by the great body of the people of all parties. I think no greater disaster could happen to Louisiana and no more fatal precedent could be set for the future peace of this nation than for Congress now to intervene and in time of profound peace set aside a State government and order a new election, violate the constitution of the State of Louisiana, and impose upon Louisiana State officers and a Legislature elected in defiance of her own constitution and laws, for that is what this bill proposes to do. If it may be done in Louisiana, it may be done in New York, in Wisconsin, in Indiana, anywhere else, and from that time forward State governments become things of sufferance, mere convenience, and expedience, to be set aside according to the passions of the hour or the interests of parties.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not know that I shall vote for the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin when it comes before the Senate; but I think it is right that he should have the privilege of bringing that question before the Senate whenever he sees proper to do so. I concur with him that no more important question can be presented at the present session to Congress than the question involved in the condition of affairs in Louisiana. I am surprised at the enunciations of Senators on this floor that there has been a general acquiescence on the part of the people of Louisiana in the present condition of affairs in that State. Why, sir, it is known to every Senator on this floor that if the Federal power was withdrawn, if the troops of the United States were removed from Louisiana and a proclamation made that the people of Louisiana should settle this matter for themselves, the Kellogg government would vanish out of existence in less than one month. The people of Louisiana have protested against such proceedings in every way that it was possible for them to resort to. They have been before the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the present session protesting; they have appealed to the President of the United States, but have been turned away; and now are they to be turned away from this Hall of Congress? Are we to spurn their appeals for relief simply on the ground that because they do not resist the Federal authority they are supposed to acquiesce in the present condition of affairs?

I hope the bill will come up, and I say to the Senator from Ohio that while he may consider that members of this Senate will be under obligation to keep silence because the Senate refuses to take this question up, there are Senators here who are not willing that this matter shall sleep, but who are determined that the iniquity of this thing shall be exposed even if it may be presumed to violate the courtesies of the Senate. I know that there are gentlemen prepared to speak on this question. For myself, I have not expected or desired to discuss it; but when an attempt is made to prevent the question coming up so that discussion can be had, I feel for one that the iniquity of this Louisiana affair is so great that if we were to keep silence the very stones would cry out. I do not know that I shall vote for the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin when it comes before the Senate; but I hope he may have the privilege of bringing it here, that discussion may be had, that some measure for the relief of that downtrodden people may be brought about.

Mr. STEWART. I think I must call for the regular order.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator to allow me a word.

Mr. STEWART. If one speaks another will.

Mr. WEST. I have no desire at the present time to intrude a debate on the Louisiana question upon the Senate; but there have been some remarks indulged in by one or two Senators to-day which require at my hands some replication.

The Senator from Wisconsin retorted upon the Senator from Indiana by asking him whether he thought the repudiation of the debt of Louisiana was a beneficent measure? I reply to him that the reduction, the scaling, the compromising of the debt of Louisiana has been made at the request and suggestion of prominent members of the democratic party of that State; and I say to him, and I give the holders of these bonds notice too, that whenever you remit Louisiana to the care of the democratic party, you may put your bonds in your waste-baskets.

Now I will say one other word to those gentlemen who are crying about the people of Louisiana, who are here beseeching Congress to come to their relief. Who are they? The disappointed office-holders, the disappointed expectants of office; and the men who have countenanced assassination and murder in my State. Sir, the opportunity will come to reply to these men. I do not shirk it. I shall not move to lay the Louisiana bill on the table, but I shall stand here and I shall show to this Senate, if I have the power, that the rightful government of the State is now exercised there.

Sir, it is a fallacy to suppose that Mr. Kellogg cannot maintain himself. Where are the United States troops in Louisiana to-day, and how many have you got? Less than five hundred men there, and less than you have had there for the last ten years—five hundred men distributed all throughout that State to preserve tranquillity there, in a State where lawlessness has predominated to the extent that we all know of, and where lives almost innumerable have been sacrificed by the men who are now here seeking to get another chance to have possession of that government.

I only desired to say that much to the men who claim that the people of Louisiana are here asking for relief. The people of Louisiana are quietly pursuing their industrial avocations, and the government of their choice exercises the functions that they have conferred upon it. The Senate and Congress is in possession of no information that will at all warrant action. But let the question come up and let it be debated whenever the Senate is ready.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. We cannot discuss this all afternoon. One speech will bring up another.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. TIPTON. I have only a word to say.

Mr. STEWART. I will not object to a word; but I shall object to further discussion.

Mr. TIPTON. I have certainly up to this time taken no part in this discussion; and the corporation act for the Territories of the Senator from Nevada has occupied three or four days. I shall therefore be as brief as possible.

Mr. STEWART. That is the very reason why I withdrew my objection in the Senator's behalf, because he had not occupied any time, and I did not want to be discourteous.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I am not specially concerned about the people of Louisiana; I am concerned about the people of Nebraska. I regard the right of the people to organize government, the right of the people to establish constitutions, the right of the people to vote according to their State laws and to administer their individual affairs, as more sacred and important to them than any question of finance or of revenue or of national dominion that can be presented to the Senate of the United States. I want to know whether hereafter a faction in the State of Nebraska may with an established government constitutionally in existence charge that that government anticipates or contemplates fraud upon that minority; and I want to know under those circumstances whether they shall appeal away from the constitution of Nebraska, away from the laws of Nebraska, away from the ballot-box of Nebraska, and while the governor of Nebraska has control of the militia of the State and his party friends occupy all the positions of power in the State, and whether a handful of men, one in the custom-house of New Orleans in Nebraska, one at Shreveport in Nebraska, a Senator from Nebraska, a marshal of the United States in Nebraska, and a United States district attorney from Nebraska, without an army, without a ballot-box, without any authority whatever, can appeal to a future President of the United States and promise him a government sustaining him in his power if he will give them the privilege of using the Army of the United States in regard to decrees and mandates which they think they can manufacture out of a corrupt United States court. It is for Nebraska and my constituents that I feel on this question; and when this subject comes up for discussion, as their representative, the representative of their sacred rights, I shall ask the privilege of a part at least of one day, if not of two days, in the discussion; a discussion which I trust shall come into the Senate and in which all the people's representatives shall have an opportunity of participating.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to make the Louisiana bill a special order for to-morrow after the morning hour. Does the Senator from Nevada object?

Mr. STEWART. I do not object to unanimous consent being given. I object to any more discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have objected already. I said I had no objection to the matter being called up to-morrow subject to a vote of the Senate, but I object to its being made a special order.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, I give notice that at the expiration of the morning hour to-morrow I will move to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Cannot the vote be taken now as to whether we will take it up to-morrow or not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no objection to voting now on that point, I suppose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The seats are empty and it requires a two-thirds vote; but I will state to the Senator from New Jersey that I have no objection to taking the vote without debate, and let every Senator be free to say whether he desires to take up the question.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let it be made the standing rule, then, that all questions shall be decided without debate!

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. HAGER] to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HAGER, which was to strike out all after the first word of Mr. BAYARD'S amendment and insert:

> When a Territory is admitted as a State, such State shall have the same power of control, by legislation or otherwise, over corporations under this act as over corporations of such State.

Mr. BAYARD. I suggest to the Senator from California that from hearing his amendment read I do not know that I comprehend its effect; but it occurs to me that it falls short of the effect which I desire to reach by my amendment. I presume the intention is the same as was intended by my amendment. That was that these States coming into the Union should not come in shorn of those necessary powers over corporations in their midst which are at present reserved under existing State constitutions over the corporations of existing States. That is the principle which I desire to insist upon by the amendment I offered. I cannot see that the amendment to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from California so well reaches the same object. If we both intend that the reserved powers of these new States over these incorporated grantees of the public franchises within their limits shall be the same as those of the older and existing States, then it seems to me that my amendment is more preferably worded to effect that object; and I see no advantage in the language used by the Senator from California, although upon that subject I am no stickler. I care but little for the frame-work of the amendment, provided it reach the object which I had in view; and I confess, from my hearing of his amendment as read, my own frame-work of words seems to me to be preferable.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to ask the Senator a question in reference to the States already admitted into the Union. I ask what power they have had to abolish or to modify acts of incorporation passed before their admission by the territorial Legislatures acting under the general law organizing the Territories?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think there has been any system that would enable me to answer the Senator's question without qualification.

Mr. MORTON. May I ask a further question? An act of incorporation is a contract that a State is expressly prohibited from violating the obligation of, is it not?

Mr. BAYARD. I may say this to the Senator from Indiana: We have never been called upon to meet such a question before. No general law of incorporation permitting Tom, Dick, and Harry to take enormous grants of public franchises, without any special consideration of the precise enterprise they had in view, has ever been brought before the Congress of the United States, and therefore the Senator will see that it is a case of new impression to attempt to apply a broad principle of this kind to pre-existing facts. All the charters heretofore granted to railroads through Territories have been special charters; and they have been guarded by provisions of their own, and the Congress of the United States were aware of the length of the road, and the termini of the road, and the objects of the road, and the location of the road; but here is a bill that presents none of these essentials to us. The whole thing is in nubibus. Where the railroads will be, how many in number, how long, between what points, whether needed or not as public improvements, whether based upon selfish speculations, whether with the idea simply of destroying individual rights of property, we know nothing at all about. This bill is a plunge in the dark in a direction that the Government of the United States have not chosen heretofore to legislate; and therefore I do not think that we meet objections to the present bill and the scope of the bill by showing individual instances of legislation in regard to special acts creating railway corporations.

As I said before, the object of my amendment is very plain, and I think it is very proper. I do not think the amendment offered by my friend from California reaches the same end as well as the language which I have proposed. I care nothing for the frame of words, provided the idea, the intent, is accomplished. My present impression is in favor of my amendment, and I shall stand by it as against the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not taken much interest in this bill, but I have a general impression about its character which will not enable me to vote for it in any contingency; and I will say a few words in regard to the general nature and effect of the bill, not detaining the Senate more than ten minutes in any event.

Any one who has noticed the character of the amendment will see how great a subject we are dealing with, and how difficult a subject it is for the Congress of the United States to legislate upon. We are legislating for what is an empire in its dimensions, so sparsely populated that it numbers not more than one individual to eight or ten square miles, and legislating a magnificent power into the hands of a limited portion of citizens outside, so as to commit future generations through the action of the Congress of this day. When you think of this, you will begin to comprehend how large the subject is with which you are dealing.

I think this whole measure is entirely inexpedient, and it grows out of two or three prominent facts. The first is that we are legislating, or proposing to legislate, in advance of population over nearly one-half of the territory of the United States. That of itself is a gigantic proposition. We are sitting here to-day attempting to mature a bill the comprehension and scope of which is to authorize a limited number of persons to indicate the track of railways over nearly one-half of the territory of the United States, and that for all time, and that, too, in advance of population, and that, too, in a country exceptional in its characteristics, exceptional in its physical geography, exceptional in its climate, in its soil, and in its productions. Now, can anybody say that under such circumstances it is wise for us to undertake to exercise such an authority as that? To my mind it ignores the very first principles which underlie civilization in this country. What is the genius of our institutions? Local self-government, is it not? What becomes of local self-government here if, by authority of Congress, you put it into the power of five men to monopolize for all coming time the railways over so large a section of country as this in advance of population?

Mr. STEWART. Shall I interrupt the Senator by asking him a question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not many words to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine declines to yield.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I do not decline.

Mr. STEWART. What ought to be done? Does the Senator think in the first place it is important that railways should be built at all there?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will answer that in the general——

Mr. STEWART. I want the Senator to answer two or three questions categorically.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we can wait a little until there is time to see what is necessary to be done. Does not my friend know what we have done? Have we not provided for four transcontinental railways through this very country, and cannot we wait a little? Have we not expended out of the public Treasury enough, so that we can afford to wait a little?

Mr. STEWART. Let me call attention right there. The Senator says we have provided for four transcontinental railroads. That is not what we are after. There were one hundred and fifty different bills before the last Congress for special grants to build railroads, most of them leading to mining camps and the like. A man living in Maine can very well wait for these roads; but a man living out there, whose all is invested in business across the desert, cannot.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to go on. I mean to be very brief and general. I am not going to pitch into the bill in detail; I only intend to speak of the general principles that induce me to vote against any such proposition.

The Senator says Maine can wait. Did we not wait two hundred years there before we saw the glimpse of a railway or anything of the kind? The difficulty is that we are legislating in regard to the far West, the new far West, the great far West, which is a problem, an enigma in its characteristics in all respects. In the great characteristics that characterize and distinguish a community, it is a severe contrast with all we know on this side of the great far West. That is the country we are legislating about, and into that country we have poured our treasure; across that we have built or are contemplating the building of four gigantic highways, and we have endowed them with empires, each of them, in land. Can we not wait?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the hurry? Can we not wait for that wagon a little? Must we forestall settlements in that country? Must we forestall and direct the settlements in that country? Why, Mr. President, the great evil which we are putting on foot is that we are forestalling all that region of country. There is nothing going on there that is at all the normal condition of things. How have settlements made their progress in this country? Slow in the beginning, but they laid the foundation of things; the beginnings were all small. Now we are doing everything in that far-off country by dint of corporations. Here is a grand scheme for covering that whole country over in the cheapest and most easy method by paper corporations. I think the whole thing is wrong.

Let us look a little at that country that my friend thinks cannot afford to wait. I have already said what its dimensions are in a territorial point of view. It is nearly one-half the Union, including the five States west of the Missouri River and the nine Territories. What do they represent to-day? By way of illustrating what I am attempting, let us compare them with a little territory of about eight thousand, or less than eight thousand, square miles. Here you have about a million and a half of people embraced in the five States and nine Territories. Now compare that with little Massachusetts with eight thousand square miles, and let us see whether these people cannot afford to wait a little with what is being done, wait for the ordinary progress of events. Why, Mr. President, Massachusetts has to-day a population just about equal to these five States and nine Territories. The valuation of that little State is equal to the valuation of these five States and these nine Territories, and yet we are told that there is such a demand for railroads that we must enact a bill here which authorizes a few persons to cover that whole country with paper charters. I think it is a most extraordinary exercise of authority on the part of Congress; and the difficulty comes exactly at this point. We do not hesitate to say that so far as Congress is concerned it shall have the right to alter, amend, or repeal these charters. My honorable friend from Arkansas thinks it is a very extraordinary power to allow the States to do the same thing. So it is; but it is only the exercise of the same power that we claim for ourselves; and it illustrates the extraordinary character of what we are doing. We claim the right to alter, amend, or repeal any act which we may impose on a Territory; but when we come to say, looking into the future, that we will devolve the same right upon the future States to exist there, gentlemen hesitate. Why should you hesitate? Why should not the State have the same right to control the corporation which we fasten upon them that we have when we fasten it upon that Territory? Of course they should; and gentlemen who are willing to go the logic of this, gentlemen who are willing to authorize paper charters in all directions over one-half the territory of this country in advance of population, should not hesitate to say that the power which we exercise may be exercised by the coming governments in that territory; and therefore I shall vote for this amendment. I shall vote for it because, if we intend to do such an extraordinary thing as that, we must allow the coming generations, who will at some time or other assume the rights of self-government which belong to us all under our theory of government, to occupy the same position they would have provided these Territories be made into States precisely as they have been on this side of the Pacific.

Mr. President, railways are not a necessity of a Territory in advance of population. Railways, as other ways, are made to accommodate the people; and I lay this down as a fundamental proposition: if they go in advance of that, they are necessarily speculative in their character; they are not to accommodate the people. It may have been a good thing, it undoubtedly was a good thing that over that country we should stretch railways; and I believe I have favored three of them certainly, the Central and Union Pacific, the Northern Pacific, and one other, because it seemed to me that on general principles, considering the character of that country, it was well to cross it. But when you come to delegate a power which touches the people in their intimate and domestic relations and which belongs to the people themselves, or at least which the people themselves should have a voice in, I hesitate to confer so large a power.

Mr. President, for these general reasons I shall not be able to vote for this bill. I shall vote for this amendment to it, because whatever power we choose to confer upon any people to build railroads in that Territory it seems to me we ought to confer upon the people who succeed these territorial governments by State governments in the future.

Mr. STEWART. I did not think I would say another word; but the idea is now presented you will deny to the Territories the naked privilege of building railroads, and they are told to wait when the Western States have all had their land grants and their aid from Congress in every way. Here all that is asked is the simple right to build railroads without any exclusive privileges, upon their own money, under such restrictions as may be proposed in this bill. When that simple right is asked we are told to wait! Sir, there is no propriety in waiting. We want to have these mountains opened, and we want to enrich Maine and Massachusetts; we want to help them. We want Montana and Utah and Colorado and New Mexico and Arizona to help as Nevada is now helping. We want thirty or forty millions a year from each of them, which we can have, and the people will get it if you will just let them alone and let them build their own roads. They do not want one exclusive privilege from you. Limit the corporation as you please. But after all the liberal, and as is generally contended extravagant, legislation for the rest of the country, to say that the people who have been so unfortunate as to locate in the Territories shall not have the poor privilege of building their own roads, seems cruel.

It is suggested that this should be left to the territorial Legislatures. We know that that is unwise from the experience of Utah and Colorado and every other Territory where they have had that privilege. We do not want a few men to get ahead and get exclusive privileges and involve the Territories in debt; but we want to give the real people who own the property there and develop the mines the privilege of building railroads to them.

You say it is not needed; it is in advance of the demand. At the last session of Congress there were one hundred and fifty bills here all asking special privileges to build railroads in Territories. There is a very large number of these bills now pending. Some of them have gone through with such privileges as no one would think of granting on careful consideration. Here we can limit them so that there will be a free competition in building railroads. But the idea is suggested that this will spread that country with paper corporations. They cannot spread it beyond the railroads made, and another person can build a railroad right beside them under the same general law. Should they not have the right to spread a corporation to the length of the road that is built in good faith? They can develop that country and enrich the nation; for by these Territories this nation must be redeemed from debt if it ever is redeemed. The region between the foot of the Rocky Mountains and the western slope of the Sierra Nevadas must relieve this nation from debt; must bring you back to specie payments if it is ever done. And I say God speed to the men who will build railroads there with their own money, as this bill proposes, and enrich the nation. Put any limitations upon it you please. Give them such legislation that men who have money will know they will be protected, and stop special legislation that gives A, B, or C the chance to come here and get a law to sell out. Stop a few adventurers in a Territory from getting special legislation there that shall involve them in debt. Give a general law, under which any citizen of the United States, whether he be from Maine or Massachusetts, may invest his money and develop that great country. Railroads have now become a necessity of the age; and while there is great complaint against the mode of their use, against monopolies under them, there is no objection to any man building a road. The people understand the distinction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. HAGER. I will explain to the Senator from Delaware the difference between his proposed amendment and the modification of it which I have suggested. His amendment goes further than I am willing to go myself. It is in these words:

> Any charter herein granted shall be revocable by the Legislature of any State which may hereafter be formed out of any Territory or Territories of the United States organized and admitted into the Union as a State within whose limits any such railroad shall, in whole or in part, be found to exist.

The remaining portion is substantially to the effect of that I have drawn, although not quite so broad. This portion of the amendment I am opposed to, and for this reason: No corporation with that provision in the law would ever be formed in a Territory. People would at once say, "We may be deprived of all our franchises at any time by a hostile Legislature in the State." There is not a sufficient guarantee, in other words, to encourage the investment of money in this kind of enterprise when this limitation is attached to it by which the franchises of the corporation and its existence may be obliterated by the Legislature. For this reason I think the law would be inoperative. It would be a useless law upon our statute-books with that provision in it. No man would invest his money in a railroad enterprise when the object of the law under which he claimed to be incorporated could be changed in the manner proposed.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from California, when you have the same provisions, almost in the same words, reserving powers in the constitutions of the various States, why is there more fear of their oppressive operation in the new States than in the old ones?

Mr. HAGER. I do not know where they are in the constitutions.

Mr. BAYARD. I have cited one case, the State of Pennsylvania, whose statute-book contains a general law for the incorporation of railways quite carefully guarded, limiting the corporators to citizens of their own State, and very definitely fixing the operation of the law; and the constitution of Pennsylvania expressly contains the very language used by me in the amendment I have drawn.

The constitution of the State in which I live has for the last seventy years contained that same power of revocation in every case; and yet I am not aware, except once or twice in the case of bank charters which were attempted to be used for fraudulent purposes, that the power of revocation was ever exercised. There is really no more reason why the new State sovereignty is not to be trusted with such a power than an old one. I simply desire when the States come in as members of the Union, that they shall come in unshorn of any of those powers which are now reposed in their elder sisters.

Mr. HAGER. That principle would apply to every act that Congress might see fit to pass in regard to the Territories. In all our legislation in regard to Territories, the laws may be restrictive in a certain sense, and the States will come in shorn of their powers to the extent that Congress has the constitutional power to legislate for the Territories. So the principle would apply to every statute that might be passed by Congress for the Territories. I presume the Senator will admit that.

Now, so far as wholesome legislation is concerned, it is all right enough. The constitution of my State contains a provision that the charters of corporations may be changed and limited. I do not recollect whether it goes so far as to say that they may be revoked. The proposition here is to give to the States the power to revoke the legislation of Congress. If such a principle should be recognized here to control us in this particular legislation, why should it not be recognized to control us in all kinds of legislation? If it is so harsh as to destroy the particular purpose that we have in view, to authorize a right of way through the public domain, it renders the legislation inoperative.

As I stated when I was up before, this is a proposition to allow railroads the right of way over public domain by a general law instead of a special law. If there is any reason in the proposition advanced by the Senator from Delaware as applicable to this proposed bill, it would be applicable if it was a case of special legislation granting a particular franchise or right of way to a particular corporation, and I do not know that any such legislation has ever heretofore transpired. I do not know that any limitation of that kind has heretofore been required in the legislation, so far as it has been special, in authorizing a right of way over the public domain.

The main question, as I said before, and I will repeat it, so far as it applies to the argument of the Senator from Maine, is a question between a general law to accomplish this purpose or a special law. In our State we have discovered that special laws are more objectionable than general laws. Where a law is required to be general it is applicable to all corporations formed under it. Where it is special it is applicable to the particular corporation, and a pressure may be brought upon the Legislature in favor of a special law when it would not be brought in regard to a general law. In that respect I think perhaps legislation by general laws has the advantage over legislation by special laws. Certainly no such franchises, no such subsidies would ever have been granted by a general law as were granted by Congress to the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific and other railroads. If the laws had been general under which those franchises were conceded, they never would have been passed in the world in the shape they were; and I think there would be much less apprehension, so far as the principle of legislation is involved, by making a general law to cover these cases than a special law.

The amendment that I have proposed as a substitute for that of the Senator from Delaware merely provides that the corporations formed under this law shall be governed by the States afterward in the same way as they control by legislation their own corporations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, offered as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That when a Territory is admitted as a State, such State shall have the same power and control, by legislation and otherwise, over corporations under this act as over corporations of such State.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I desire to say a word on the amendment offered by the Senator from California. It seems to me that what he seeks to accomplish is right. It strikes me, however, that there may be some ambiguity in the amendment offered by him which will subject it to two interpretations. The amendment provides that the Legislature of a State may exercise the same right to amend charters procured under this act, and may legislate in reference to corporations created under this act, as they can in reference to corporations created by themselves. Now, Mr. President, the rule of law is that a Legislature cannot amend a charter, and cannot legislate with reference to the rights of a corporation created by itself unless the charter of that corporation contains a provision that the Legislature may so act. In this case, this act when it passes will contain no provision that the Legislature of the State can act in reference to corporations except so far as relates to corporations created by themselves. A part of the corporations created by the Legislature may contain in the charters a provision giving the Legislature the right to amend the charters; a part may be created without any such provision. Consequently a part of those corporations can be legislated upon by the Legislature, and a part cannot be legislated upon by the Legislature; and what will be the right of the Legislature in reference to the corporations created under this act when that right is to be governed by its power over other corporations, over a part of which it has power and over a part not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is now the amendment of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from California struck out all the original amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. STEWART. Let the call for the yeas and nays be withdrawn. I have no objection to it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to withdrawing the call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. CONKLING. I object to withdrawing the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would be very much obliged if the Chair would let the precise amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment as amended now reads:

That when a Territory is admitted as a State, such State shall have the same power and control, by legislation and otherwise, over corporations under this act as over corporations of such State.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Saulsbury, Scott, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, and Wadleigh—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Hitchcock, Pratt, Ramsey, and Sprague—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Sherman, Thurman, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. Some Senators seem to think there was an ambiguity about the former amendment I submitted, and I presume it failed because of that idea. I now offer the following as an additional section:

That the stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable for all labor done in the construction of the road.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend the amendment by saying "to the extent of their stock" after the word "liable."

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator mean an amount equal to their stock in addition to their stock?

Mr. CLAYTON. An amount equal to their individual stock, of course.

Mr. STEWART. Would this be before the property of the corporation was exhausted? The property of the corporation ought first to be liable, because the directors might refuse to pay the laborers and send them after the stockholders, which would make it very awkward.

Mr. PRATT. I will explain to the Senator why I struck out that feature. It would impose a very great hardship on the laborers if they were compelled to go into the courts and institute a suit and exhaust all the assets of the corporation before they could come on the stockholders. That was the reason why I struck that feature out of the amendment. Under the amendment which I now offer the claims will be but small, they will belong to laborers; and the stockholders ought in equity to be responsible for the labor expended in the construction of a road.

Mr. STEWART. But the stockholder ought to have some protection. They may not go to the company in the first instance, but may come to him first.

Mr. PRATT. The answer to that is that the stockholders elect a board of directors, and if the directors are so negligent or so recreant to their duty that they misapply the funds of the corporation and let the laborers who have built the road go unpaid, the stockholders ought to be personally and individually liable.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will withdraw the amendment which I suggested, and offer the following in lieu of it: Insert, after the word "liable" the words "for the debts of the corporation to any amount equal to the stock held by them." Let them be liable for all the debts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Indiana so as to make the clause read:

The stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable for all debts against the corporation to an amount equal to the stock held by them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course that would be over and above the other liabilities of the company.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRATT. I do not understand how the amendment of my friend from Arkansas accomplishes what he desires to accomplish. The stockholders by the terms of their subscription are already liable for the amount of the stock subscribed by them of course. Now his amendment does not increase that liability. It renders the amendment offered by me wholly frivolous.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think the stockholders are liable to pay to the corporation the money subscribed by them to the stock. Of course they are liable to pay for their stock; but I propose to make them liable individually for the debts of the corporation.

Mr. PRATT. Beyond the amount which they have paid for their stock?

Mr. CLAYTON. Equal to the amount of their stock. That is like a provision that is in the general law of my own State, but that makes them liable to double the amount of their stock. I propose to make them liable to an amount equal to their stock.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same provision that is in the national-bank act?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir. Unless that is put in this act, individual liability cannot be placed upon them. Of course they are liable to pay for the stock they subscribe; but they are not liable individually for the debts of the company, and I propose to make them liable to an amount equal to the stock held by them.

Mr. PRATT. If the Senator's amendment accomplished that, I should accept it, but I am afraid from its phraseology that it does not.

Mr. CLAYTON. If its phraseology does not, I should like to have it changed so that it shall accomplish that.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Senator from Arkansas, I understand, says that the stockholders are liable for the amount of their stock. Suppose installments are not called for, then are they liable? Can there be a suit brought against the subscribers to secure the full payment? Is that provision in the bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. I presume they are not liable to the company to pay for their stock unless it is called for, but this is an additional liability of an individual nature, under which they will be liable for the debts of the corporation to an amount equal to the stock subscribed by them.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. My difficulty precedes that. In looking over this bill I see that the stockholders are required to pay in 10 per cent. at the time of subscription, and they are required to pay in installments of 10 per cent. at such times as it may be called for not oftener than once in ninety days. Now my inquiry is whether, in case the directors do not call for a further installment and they go on and employ workmen to grade the road and lay the track, the workmen will have any way by which they can be paid for their labor if the directors do not call for further installments?

Mr. HAGER. The amendment proposed, as I understand, is to make the stockholders liable for the debts of the company to an amount equal to their stock. I presume it should be "in amounts proportioned to their stock." The usual phraseology in such cases is that each stockholder shall be held liable in proportion to his stock for, the debts of the company; that is to say, he shall pay a proportion of the debts just as he stands in relation to the capital stock of the company. If he owns one-tenth he pays one-tenth of the debt; if he owns two-tenths he pays two-tenths, and so on. It should be that he should be held liable in proportion to his stock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 20, noes 5; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment as proposed to be amended reads:

The stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable, to an amount equal to the stocks subscribed by them, for all debts of such corporation.

Mr. STEWART. "Contracted during the time they held their stock." I would suggest that modification.

Mr. HAMLIN. "And in one year thereafter."

Mr. CLAYTON. It does not say "the owner of stock," but the "stockholder."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suppose that amendment cannot now be entertained; but I should like to have "stockholders or their assignees" inserted. I would follow the original holder of the stock and his assignee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No further amendment is now in order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, on which the Senator from Nevada calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest a further amendment that the stock of the individual shall not be liable longer than he holds the stock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A further amendment is not in order. The yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I shall not vote. We consider ourselves paired on the whole thing.

The call of the roll having been concluded,

Mr. HAGER. I am not in favor of the amendment, and therefore vote against it; but if it were amended as I proposed, I would vote for it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am told that my vote is necessary to make a quorum. Not knowing how the Senator from Missouri would vote, as it will not affect the result, I shall vote for this amendment to make a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckingham, Carpenter, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Tipton, and Wadleigh—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Chandler, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Jones, Mitchell, Ramsey, Scott, and Stewart—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Howe, Kelly, Lewis, Merrimon, Norwood, Ogleaby, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Thurman, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. Bills of this character have heretofore passed with a clause which has been omitted in this, and I suggest an amendment, to come in on the twenty-ninth page, after the word "road," in the third line of section 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, as amended by the vote just taken.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will wait until that is disposed of.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose to insert after the word "road," in the third line of the nineteenth section, the following words:

And shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph lines and transport the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States upon said railroad at a compensation not to exceed the amount paid by private parties for the same kind of service.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer an amendment in addition to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] just now adopted. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas makes the subscribers to stock individually liable for the debts of the company to the amount of stock which they subscribe. It is known that stock frequently passes from the hands of the original subscribers to assignees, and my amendment is to follow the assignee and make him liable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert at the end of the section in relation to the liability of stockholders the following:

And the assignee of any such stock shall be liable to the same extent.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that changes the meaning of the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Railroads as it has been amended, being a substitute for the original bill.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move, in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth lines of section 9, to strike out the word "party" and insert in place thereof "corporation," so that the individual whose land is taken by the road shall not be required to give bond on an appeal from the award of the commissioners.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I should like to hear the amendment reported which has been adopted in regard to the liability of stockholders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable to an amount equal to the stock subscribed by them for all debts of such corporation, and the assignee of any such stock shall be liable to the same extent.

Mr. HAGER. I should like to move an amendment to that, to strike out the words immediately following "liable" and insert "in proportion to their stock."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order at present.

Mr. STEWART. It will be in order when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. HAGER. Then I have another amendment. On page 22, line 42, section 9, I move to strike out "the whole cost incurred by both parties" and insert "costs of appeal."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Line 42 has been stricken out already.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which is a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I propose to add some words to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] He saw fit to propose an amendment that the assignees shall be held responsible where the party owning stock shall sell out. Now, I think that is a very nice way for any party who holds stock and wants to get rid of it, to be allowed by the charter to assign it to some irresponsible person. I move to amend by providing that no sale to any assignee shall be valid unless the assignee is responsible. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be reported.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I presume the Senator from Delaware will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is too late for him to accept it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as my amendment is concerned, I will say that while persons sometimes with fraudulent intent make assignments, yet gentlemen who hold stock in which they put their money in a railroad company are very careful how they make fraudulent assignments of it,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the words read which the Senator from Delaware moved to insert.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And the assignee of any such stock shall be liable to the same extent.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that he probably has released the prior owner from the liability. If he would by his amendment say that the assignee shall be liable for all future charges upon the stock, thus implying or permitting at least the supposition that the assignor was to continue liable for all liability prior to the time of the transfer, that would do. I should like to hear the prior words read as they stand. Let the whole section be read together.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable, to an amount equal to the stock subscribed by them, for all debts of such corporation; and the assignee of any such stock shall be liable to the same extent.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware to amend his amendment so that it will read "and the assignee shall in like manner be liable for all debts incurred after the transfer to him."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York move an amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. No; I do not move to amend it in that way. I merely make the suggestion in order to say that as it seems to me, if the Senator will leave the bill as he finds it, it will answer his purpose. The stockholder will be liable, the original stockholder up to the time that he transfers his stock, and the moment he does transfer his stock the assignee becomes the holder of that stock, and then the liability attaches to him; whereas if he provides as he has now provided, it seems to me that it would at least leave room to doubt whether he would not exonerate the stockholder from the liability which attached and ought to attach to the stock prior to the time that he transferred it to his assignee. I think the section is better without the latter words. I suggest that to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have very great confidence in the legal acumen of the honorable Senator from New York; but I do not think he has put exactly the proper construction on that amendment. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas the stockholder was made liable. It occurred to me that the stockholder might reside remote from these Territories; or he might make an assignment of the stock; he might leave the Territory, and some other person become the holder of the stock to which he had subscribed; and it would be proper, therefore, that the liability should attach in the hands of the holder after the stock had been assigned. That was the object which I had in view. I am not certain but that, instead of releasing the original subscriber, both he and his assignee will be liable under my amendment; but I am willing to hear any suggestion.

Mr. CONKLING. There seems to be an idea with some Senators that a distinction exists legally between one who originally subscribed for stock and one who buys from him who did originally subscribe for stock. I submit there is no such distinction known to the law. A stockholder is the holder and owner of the share or scrip which represents his interest. Whether his interest accrued from a subscription made anterior to the inception of the corporation, if you please, or originally made, or whether it accrued because he purchased the whole right of one who did so originally subscribe, is of no consequence whatever. If I am right in that, let me see the force of the amendment as it stood prior to the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware: "The stockholders"—not the original subscribers—"the stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable to an amount equal to the stock held by them." What does that mean?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understood the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to say "to the amount of stock originally subscribed."

Mr. CLAYTON. The amendment is imperfect in that respect. I think it ought to be amended so as to read "subscribed or held by him," and I was going to suggest that.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us examine that one moment and let us see whether it can be tested so as to get up a possible doubt. A subscribed for $10,000 of the stock. Subsequently he sold $5,000 of the stock to B. What is the liability? A is liable for the whole $10,000 as long as he holds it. When he parts with $5,000 he transmits its liability to him who becomes the holder pro tanto of the stock, that is of $5,000.

Mr. CLAYTON. He is the subscriber then.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no such thing in the amendment, as I read it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Read it again and you will see.

Mr. CONKLING. I read the ink which I suppose represents the amendment; but there is so much interlined in pencil that I can hardly tell which is the right text:

The stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable to an amount equal to the stock held by them.

Now there are in pencil words which I will read, which I supposed, brackets being around them, were not part of it, but perhaps they are, "to an amount equal to the stock subscribed by them"——

Mr. CLAYTON. That was the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. What became of the subsequent words, "to the amount of the stock held by them." They cannot both have been adopted.

Mr. CLAYTON. The amendment as adopted was, I think, "subscribed."

Mr. CONKLING. Then I beg to suggest to the Senator that this is the solution of the whole matter. Let the amendment read as I supposed it to read: "The stockholders of any corporation to be formed under this act shall be individually liable to the amount of the stock held by them." I would suggest, however, as a better phraseology, "equal to the amount of the stock of which they shall be the holders." "Held" is in a past tense, and there might be a possible cavil about that; but surely it would be plain if you say, and I will put it in the singular: "Each stockholder in any corporation to be formed under this act shall be liable to the amount of stock of which he shall be the holder." What does that mean?

Mr. CLAYTON. Would that apply to stock only partially paid up?

Mr. CONKLING. It would apply to stock partially paid up if this does. I do not know what the provisions of the bill in that respect are. The provisions of most of the general railway acts of the States are such that there must be 10 per cent. paid in in order to fasten and fix the rights of parties. Is that so in this bill?

Mr. STEWART. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well, then, every man who subscribes and pays 10 per cent. becomes a stockholder, and everybody to whom he sells becomes a stockholder; and if you say that every holder of stock in this corporation shall be liable to the amount of the stock of which he is the holder, it is an ever-speaking, never-silent declaration applying to every day and visiting every owner of stock with a liability as great as the total stock he holds. Therefore, if I have consent, I will suggest, if the Clerk will take my words, the amendment in this form:

Every stockholder in any corporation to be formed under this act shall be liable to an amount equal to the stock of which he is the holder.

And I would suggest to the Senator from Nevada to say, "at its par value;" otherwise there may be some doubt as to what that means, "of which he is the holder, at the par value thereof."

Mr. CLAYTON. That will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York move that amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. I move it as an amendment in lieu of this section. I believe it is satisfactory all around.

Mr. MORTON. Let it be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed, as follows:

Any stockholder in any corporation to be formed under this act shall be liable to the amount of the stock of which he is the holder, at the par value thereof.

Mr. HAMLIN. If I have comprehended the object sought by the Senator from Delaware, it seems to me it should be accomplished by adding to this amendment, as it now stands, the words, "for one year after the transfer of said stock." A is a stockholder in a company to-day. It becomes embarrassed; he knows it is embarrassed; and he transfers his stock to B, who is an irresponsible man, and thus avoids the whole obligation of the clause as it now stands. The liability of the stockholder at all times ought to exist for one year after the transfer of his stock, within which time those who may be creditors of the corporation may have a chance to enforce their claims.

Mr. CONKLING. May I then suggest to my friend to move as an addition the words, "which liability shall continue for one year after any transfer of said stock?"

Mr. HAMLIN. That will answer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that it ought to be restricted to apply only to debts created before the transfer of stock.

Mr. HAMLIN. That would be so, of course.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me a moment, I will repeat the suggestion: "which liability shall continue as to debts existing at the time of transfer, one year after said transfer."

Mr. WADLEIGH. I would suggest to my friend from New York whether it would be just to make a stockholder liable for debts created while he was not a stockholder, and whether the liability should not be confined to debts of the corporation created while he was a stockholder.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will pardon me. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Maine was like his, and the amendment is intended to effectuate that suggestion. If it does not, the Senator can change it. I understand it to mean this: that every stockholder shall be liable to the amount of his stock, and that liability as to debts contracted before he transferred his stock shall run for a year after the transfer is made. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] suggests that this might attach to debts which had been created before he became a holder of the stock. Not at all. If I perceive the force of the language, he is liable for the amount of his stock at par for the debts existing at the time, and he continues liable a year after he transfers his stock. Now, the assignor of the person in question would be liable for antecedent debts. The corporation would be liable primarily for all the debts; then the stockholders would be liable, each one for the debts contracted in his time, and he would continue liable for a year.

Mr. MORTON. It occurs to me now that this amendment is in a position where it is liable to do great injustice on the one hand or to amount to nothing at all on the other. If by saying that the stockholders shall be liable for one year after the transfer it is meant that he shall be liable for new debts that may be created by the corporation for one year after the transfer, that would be obviously unjust and prevent the sale of stock. If his liability upon his stock is to terminate at the end of one year after it has been transferred, then the liability becomes illusive entirely and of little value practically to the creditors of the company, because you cannot tell when the stock is transferred. These certificates ordinarily are assigned in blank, and sometimes in New York they will pass through a hundred hands, and you cannot tell how long a man has had it or who has had it.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there no provision in the bill for transfers on the books?

Mr. MORTON. There is a provision in the bill for the transfer of stock on the books; but practically the man who holds the certificate is equitably and legally the owner, and has the right to fill up the blank at any time. That is the way stock is dealt in. This liability, to amount to anything, ought to continue, so that the creditor will have somebody that he can fix upon. He should be able to go back to the original stockholders, the men who started the thing, the men who induced him to become a creditor. But if their liability shall terminate at the end of a year, whom has he to fix it upon?

Mr. CONKLING. I will say in answer to that question that the remedy for the Senator's suggestion would be to provide, if it is not so provided, that no transfer shall be valid or shall take effect for any purpose unless the same is made on the books of the corporation. Then everybody resorts to these books just as much as everybody resorts to the record of a deed to see how the title to the land stands.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That would embarrass business. I should prefer the words "transfer on the books."

Mr. CONKLING. That will accomplish the same result; "for one year after the transfer on the books of the company."

Mr. MORTON. I think the remedy becomes worthless in a case of that kind. The creditor does not know who to resort to, the stock changing hands and the stockholder being liable only for a year after his transfer. The way the thing is usually done, according to my recollection—I have not had much to do with corporations lately—is that where there is an additional liability upon the part of the holders of the stock, that liability continues so that the creditor can always fix definitely upon a party who is liable to him, and then if it is transferred to B the liability of B is added to that of A, and then if B transfers it to C the liability of C is added to that of B and A, and so it goes on, so that every additional transfer adds to the security of the creditor. That I think has been the usual practice.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to modify the amendment by changing a word or two, so as to read thus:

Every stockholder in any corporation to be formed under this act shall be liable, to an amount equal to the stock of which he is the holder at the par value thereof, which liability shall continue as to debts existing at the time of transfer for one year after the transfer thereof on the books of the corporation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We can shape this provision in any way we please. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Maine may be a very proper one, but I think it weakens the liability instead of strengthening it. I think as it stood without that amendment, if debts were contracted and became fixed debts of the company, so that the liability of the stockholder was fixed, he would be liable if he transferred his stock; but now that provision limits his liability to a year after the transfer.

Mr. MORTON. It shifts the liability at the end of the year.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is a statute of limitation.

Mr. MORTON. It is a statute of limitation for one year. That is the effect of it precisely.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Perhaps it is fair enough, because then the assignee becomes the stockholder, and he being liable, perhaps it is right that the stockholders who have control of the company should be the stockholders who are liable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I will make one other suggestion. Will it not meet the idea of the Senator from Maine, the Senator from New Jersey, and others if the amendment were so changed as to charge liability upon every holder of stock for debts contracted during the time when he was such stockholder?

Mr. STEWART. That is the California law.

Mr. CONKLING. Is not that definite? And does not that change this from a statute of limitations into a broader liability in the direction which the Senator from Maine suggested?

Mr. MORTON. That diminishes the liability.

Mr. STEWART and others. Let it go as it is.

Mr. CONKLING. Senators say, "Let it go as it is." This latter branch having originated with the Senator from Maine, it seems to me that now it operates as a statute of limitations merely and fixes the limitation at a year. If, on the other hand, you change it so as to visit liability upon every stockholder up to the amount of his stock for all debts contracted in his time, there it is; and if the debt be of such a nature that it extends for twenty years, like a specialty under seal, so be it. If it is a parol contract which, under the statutes of most of the States, would run for six years, so be it. If it is in the nature of a penalty, something for which a qui tam action is given, which ordinarily has but two or three years to run, by the codes of the States, so be it. You would leave it there. My own belief is that that would be better.

Mr. MORTON. That would be better than it is now.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose you put it at two years. That would be a reasonable statute of limitations. Suppose subsequently men came in and squandered the capital without paying the debts.

Mr. LOGAN. A year is long enough. Why should a man be liable for debts contracted before he became a stockholder? Although the liability attaches to the stockholder for a year, yet the liability attaches to the man to whom stock is assigned commencing at the time it is assigned for debts commencing at that time, not behind that. Each man should be liable only for the debts contracted while he held the stock. I think that is the right way.

Mr. CONKLING. What does the Senator from Nevada say to this:

Every stockholder in any corporation to be formed under this act shall be liable for all debts of said corporation contracted while he holds stock, to an amount equal to the stock of which he is holder, at the par value of the——

Mr. MORTON. I suggest that making the stockholder liable to the par value of the stock is an unnecessary embarrassment, because the stock may not be worth ten cents or twenty-five cents on the dollar. Therefore a man takes a liability usually far greater than what he gets for it.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator want to confine the liability to the actual value of the stock, so that if the corporation fails and the stock is worth nothing there will be no liability? If he does, the true way is to vote against everything of the sort and offer an absolute immunity. The Senator will see that if stockholders are to be liable only for the actual value of the stock, you have exonerated them in the only event when a liability is good for anything. What is that event? The event of a failure of the corporation, so that the corporate assets are non sunt. Then it is an object to have personal liability. But if you say there shall be no personal liability beyond the value of the paper on which the scrip is printed, the whole thing is of no use.

Now I venture to still further modify my amendment so that it will read:

Every stockholder in any corporation to be formed under this act shall be liable for all debts of said corporation contracted while he holds the same, to an amount equal to the stock of which he is the holder, at the par value thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York as a substitute for the liability section in the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to renew the amendment I offered in Committee of the Whole in relation to cumulative voting. In line 19 of section 7 I move to strike out—

Each share shall entitle the owner to one vote, and a majority of votes cast shall be necessary for a choice;

And to insert in lieu thereof:

In all elections for directors of any corporation organized under the provisions of this act each shareholder shall be entitled to cast for each director to be elected one vote for each share of stock held by him, or may, at his option, cast the whole number of his votes for one candidate, or distribute them upon two or more candidates, as he may prefer; and the candidates corresponding in number to the directors to be elected receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. CLAYTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hitchcock, McCreery, Morton, Pratt, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Tipton, and Wadleigh—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover Cragin, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Mitchell, Patterson, Ramsey, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, and West—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Sprague, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—34.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I should like to hear the Senator from Nevada explain the object of the eighteenth section. It provides:

That any railroad corporation heretofore organized under the acts of the Legislature of any Territory shall, upon filing with the Secretary of the Interior its original articles of incorporation, or a certified copy thereof, and its acceptance of this act, be recognized from and after the date of such acceptance for all the objects and purposes of this act, and shall be entitled to all the privileges and benefits, and shall be subject to all the restrictions herein granted or imposed.

Heretofore some railroad corporation may have been chartered in some Territory and received its charter upon certain conditions. There may have been something in the nature of a contract between some corporation in some Territory and the Legislature thereof. There may have been some law passed by which certain duties have been imposed upon them which they have accepted, some limitations. Now, if the object of this section is to relieve them from duties which have been imposed on them and which they have accepted, to change their status, I should not be in favor of passing the bill with that section in it.

Mr. STEWART. It is restrictive on them. They can come under this bill with restrictions, but it does not add to their power. It confines them to the provisions of this act as they are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. STOCKTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELLY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] If he were present he would vote against the bill, and I should vote for it.

Mr. LOGAN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] If he were here he would vote against the bill, and I should vote for it.

Mr. PATTERSON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Cragin, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Mitchell, Pratt, Ramsey, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Tipton, Wadleigh, and West—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Conover, Fenton, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Stockton—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Sprague, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—34.

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended to read:

A bill to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands.

ALIENS AS ENGINEERS AND PILOTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was at the end of the second line of the bill to insert after the words "become a citizen of the United States," the words "and who shall have been a permanent resident of the United States for at least six months immediately prior to the granting of such license."

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that will be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 13, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing. The morning hour begins at thirteen minutes after twelve o'clock.

COLLECTION OF CUSTOMS, ETC.

Mr. WOOD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2908) to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the various ports of entry in the United States, and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. BASS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2909) to declare the bridge across the Niagara River authorized by the act approved June 30, 1870, a post-route; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. BELL.

Mr. LAWSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2910) granting a pension to John H. Bell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

COSTS, FEES, ETC., IN FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2911) to adjust costs, fees, and allowances in the Federal courts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN D. BERRY.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2912) for the relief of John D. Berry, of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ASA O. GALLOP.

Mr. LANSING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2913) for the relief of the heirs of Asa O. Gallop; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LAND CLAIMS IN COLORADO.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2914) for the relief of derivative claimants under the Cornelio Vigil and Ceram Saint Vrain land grants, in the Territory of Colorado; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DUELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2915) for the repeal of the act of July 4, 1864, restricting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID E. CARPENTER.

Mr. WOODFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2916) granting a pension to David E. Carpenter, late a second lieutenant First New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE A. SCHREINER.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2917) for the relief of George A. Schreiner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NOTES AND BILLS AS CURRENCY.

Mr. HAMILTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2918) to prohibit the issue of notes and bills as currency in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MANUFACTURED MUSTARD.

Mr. TOWNSEND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2919) to equalize the duty on manufactured mustard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MARY A. HOUGH.

Mr. McJUNKIN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2920) granting a pension to Mary A. Hough; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES COULTER.

WILLIAM H. HARDING.

Mr. McJUNKIN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2922) granting a pension to William H. Harding, private in Company A, Seventy-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES W. DEVEN.

Mr. MOORE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2923) granting a pension to Colonel Charles W. Deven, late of the Two hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN JUNKIN.

Mr. MOORE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2924) granting a pension to Benjamin Junkin, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and ordered to be printed.

DORATHY IRONS.

Mr. MOORE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2925) granting a pension to Dorathy Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2926) for the relief of Dorathy Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons, late of the United States First Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL D. FALLS.

Mr. MOORE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2927) granting a pension to Samuel D. Falls, of New Castle, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DUTIES, TAXES, ETC.

Mr. MYERS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2928) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MARK D. SUNSTROM.

Mr. ARCHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2929) to authorize the appointment of Mark D. Sunstrom as second assistant engineer in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, in relation to William and Mary College; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be requested to urge upon their respective bodies the passage of an act (such as passed the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress) making an appropriation to the College of William and Mary on the ground set forth in the petition submitted to Congress by the authorities of said college and in the report of the committee of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL MALONEY.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2930) for the relief of Daniel Maloney, a citizen of Norfolk, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS L. SANBORN.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2931) for the relief of Thomas L. Sanborn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES ANNA.

Mr. RAINEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2932) granting a pension to Charles Anna; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committtee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. WISDOM.

Mr. CALDWELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2933) to compensate John H. Wisdom for carrying United States mails in Alabama during the early part of 1861; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask the reference of this bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Claims would be the appropriate committee.

Mr. CALDWELL. My reason for asking its reference to the Committee on Appropriations is that that committee is now considering this question.

Mr. HAYS. It seems to me the bill ought to go to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the Committee on Appropriations ever consider an individual claim of this kind. They may be considering an appropriation out of which this claim, if good, would be paid; but the Committee on Appropriations cannot properly take up the case of an individual claimant.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand that several bills of this character have already been referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. Of course the Chair has no objection to the reference indicated by the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. I object. The bill ought to go to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the appropriate reference is clearly the Committee on Claims; and it would not forward the matter to send it to the Committee on Appropriations, for a bill of this kind would inevitably be reported back by that committee for reference to the Committee on Claims.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SUE BRADLEY JOHNSON.

Mr. SHEATS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2934) granting a pension to Sue Bradley Johnson, widow of General G. L. Johnson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN MILLER.

Mr. DARRALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2935) for the relief of John Miller, of Saint Landry Parish, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PATRICK GLACKIN.

Mr. BUNDY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2936) granting a pension to Patrick Glackin, late of Company G, Seventh Ohio Volunteer Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HUGH M'CULLOUGH.

Mr. BANNING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2937) granting a pension to Hugh McCullough, of Cincinnati, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. SEEDS.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2794) to provide for improving the navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I also present a memorial of shipowners, ship-masters, and others, of New Orleans, asking relief for the embargoed condition of the commerce of the Mississippi River, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, April 2, 1874.

SIR: We, the undersigned, masters and part owners of ships engaged in the general freighting between New Orleans and Europe, would solicit your aid in obtaining for us some relief for the embargoed commerce of this city and river. We ask neither for jettees nor canals; for we believe the most effectual remedy that could be applied would be rendered by the General Government assuming military control over the passes, and giving Major Howell, or some other efficient officer, the ordering of the movement of ships, so that none should take the bar except by his approval. The obstructions to trade are not caused generally because of the lack of water, but by the selfishness of some few owners and managers of English and German steamships, whose vessels are of great length and draught of water, being entirely unsuited for this trade. We would ask further that they may be compelled to take their turn on the bar with sailing-vessels, and not permitted to monopolize it as at present.

We think you will see the justice of our request when we state that over forty large vessels are detained at the passes, thereby causing the owners great expense and likewise detaining many valuable cargoes, to the injury of the owners and detriment of the commerce of this city. Had it not been for the blocking of the bars by the aforesaid steamships, nearly all those now detained would have been well on their way to the ports to which they were bound.

We are, as masters of sailing-vessels, subject entirely to the movements of the said steamships, their facilities for moving being so much superior to ours that immediately on one floating off another takes her place, thus constituting a perpetual blockade of said ships.

Hoping you will give us your assistance and your usual energy in obtaining the relief we ask for, or some other as effectual, we submit to your kind care and consideration.

Enoch Chase, master of Jonathan Chase, New York; S. N. Greenleaf, master of Union, Damariscotta; B. Cousins, master of Nunyuam Dormio, New York; William Kelley, master of Wild Hunter, Boston; W. P. Lincoln, master of El Capitan, Bath; J. G. Baker, master of Stirling, Bath; O. Linnekin, master of L. L. Sturges, New York; William K. Spear, master of George Skolfield, Brunswick; P. H. Taylor, master of ship Tabor, Bath; F. E. Otis, master of bark Rome, Bath; J. H. Stetson, master of Carondelet, Damariscotta; O. Strickland, master of General Strickland, Bath; George Crocker, master of Ship Expounder, Boston; Joshua Freeman, master of ship Gold Hunter, Boston; W. M. Baker, master of ship Wyoming, Philadelphia; G. W. Clark, master of ship George Peabody, Boston; J. K. Spinner, master of William Woodbury, Boston; J. F. Grozier, master of Western Empire, New York; I. H. Brooks, master of ship Exporter, Newburyport; John F. Stone, master of schooner Kate M. Hilton, Dennis; L. B. Rich, master of Mathilde Kane, Provincetown; F. B. Foster, master of Kentuckian, Boston; F. W. Brown, master of ship C. H. Southard, Richmond; I. H. Woodworth, master of ship Ellen Southard, Richmond; David H. Hall, master of ship Golden Rule, Boston; J. C. Blanchard, master of ship Helen Clinton, Providence; M. Chase, master of ship Maria C. Day, New York; F. A. Hosmer, master of ship Great Eagle, Rockland; John Urquart, master of ship F. P. Sage, New York.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
Washington, D. C.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, against discriminations practiced by the Union Pacific Railroad Company; which were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

TWO PER CENT. LAND FUND.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, also presented the memorial of the governors of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, asking for the payment of the 2 per cent. land fund; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DR. WILLIAM M. PAGE.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2975) for the relief of Dr. William M. Page, of Richmond, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SAINT MARY'S RIVER.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Southern Maryland Railroad Company is now engaged in constructing a railroad from Washington to Saint Mary's River and Point Lookout, at the confluence of the Potomac River with the Chesapeake Bay; and whereas said Railroad when completed will bring the city of Washington within two and a half hours of the Chesapeake Bay at the deep water of the harbor of Saint Mary's River, which will enable the Government to avail itself of the benefits of said harbor thus rendered accessible to the seat of Government at all times of the year: Therefore,

Be it resolved, that the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to obtain from the War Department the report and survey made of the Saint Mary's River and adjacent waters by the Topographical Bureau of the War Department, made about the year 1824, and to appoint a board of naval officers to whom the same shall be submitted, to inquire and report as to the expediency of establishing at said harbor a naval coaling station and to report the results of their investigation to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall forward the same with his recommendations thereon to this House at the next session of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that resolution ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If referred at all it ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. But it is merely a resolution calling for information.

Mr. HOLMAN. It certainly relates to a matter that belongs to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is in relation to the establishment of a naval coaling station.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I will not object.

There being no objection, the preamble and resolution were considered, and agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF AN EMPLOYÉ OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HOSKINS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the widow of James S. Sandford, late an employé of the House, a sum equal to his salary for three months; also, his proper funeral expenses; and that the Doorkeeper be authorized to send a messenger to accompany the remains to his late residence.

I desire to say a single word in relation to that resolution, and but a word. This Mr. Sandford, who was an employé of the House, died last night. He leaves a widow and family of small children, who are entirely without means. This resolution, I believe, is in accordance with the precedents of the House; and I also desire to say that I have submitted it to every member of the Committee on Accounts, and that it meets with their entire approval.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. HOSKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE EXCHANGE OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. PACKER. I move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and have passed the bill (H. R. No. 2425) to provide for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of newspapers by mail within the county where published.

The bill provides that from and after the passage of this act the following mail matter shall be allowed to pass free in the mail: First, newspapers, periodicals, and magazines, reciprocally interchanged between publishers, and not exceeding sixteen ounces in weight, to be confined to a single copy of each publication; secondly, newspapers, one copy to each actual subscriber residing or receiving the same within the county where the same is published; but carriers shall not be required to distribute such papers unless postage is paid upon them at the usual rates.

On the question of seconding the motion to suspend the rules, tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. PACKER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 98, noes 66.

So the motion was seconded.

The question was upon suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. We had better have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 178, nays 40, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Thomas, Chrisopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Waddell, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehouse, Wilber, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolfe—72.

So, two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill passed.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. STRAIT, is absent on account of sickness; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, is absent on leave; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, (having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with Mr. CURTIS, of Pennsylvania; if present he would vote "ay." I have voted in the negative, but withdraw my vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, announced that the President returned with his objections the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William H. Denniston, late acting second lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom; and

An act (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson.

SEEDS, CUTTINGS, ETC., FREE OF POSTAGE.

Mr. HAYS. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report a bill for the transmission of seeds, cuttings, and plants through the mails free of postage, and to move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

The bill provides that all seeds, cuttings, and plants, sent by the Commissioner of Agriculture to any person or persons in the United States, shall be transmitted through the mails free.

Upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules tellers were ordered, and Mr. HAYS and Mr. STONE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 96, noes 53.

So the motion was seconded.

The question was upon suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] to modify his bill so as to allow members of Congress also to send seeds and cuttings free of postage.

Mr. HAYS. I prefer to have the bill voted upon in the form in which the committee instructed me to report it.

Mr. BECK. Under this bill the Commissioner of Agriculture will give all the seeds and cuttings to his friends and we will get none.

Mr. CROOK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 84, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Averill, Barrere, Begole, Bell, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Jasper D. Ward, Whitehouse, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolfe—60.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

When the roll-call had been concluded, and before the announcement of the result,

Mr. MONROE said: Mr. Speaker, I stepped out of the House a few moments with a friend, and, returning as soon as possible, I found that the roll-call had just been completed. Have I a right to vote?

The SPEAKER. The rule is that a member who is within the bar at any time during the roll-call may vote.

Mr. MONROE. I was not.

The SPEAKER. Then the rule prohibits the gentleman from voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a point of order; and I do it in view of what may occur at some time hereafter. I hold that my colleague [Mr. MONROE] has a right under the Constitution to vote. Many gentlemen here have voted since he returned to the Hall; and now, before the announcement of the vote, while the measure is still pending, my colleague rises in his place to vote. Other members standing by his side may vote, but he may not. I know there is a rule forbidding him to vote under such circumstances, and the Speaker administers the rule according to its terms, but I believe that rule is in violation of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. In what respect?

Mr. GARFIELD. I hold that until the announcement of the vote is made each member of the House has the right under the Constitution, as a representative of his constituency, to vote on the pending question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is not only his right but his duty to vote.

Mr. DAWES. Whether interested or not?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not refer at all to the question of interest; but I mean to say that while a question is yet pending, the result unannounced, I do not believe the House can properly make a rule which denies the right of a member, as the representative of his people, to vote. I raise this question simply for the consideration of the Speaker and the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to put an inquiry to the gentleman. He says that this right exists so long as the result is not announced. Now, does not the Constitution give the right broadly if at all?

Mr. GARFIELD. I would say this: that after the announcement of a vote has been made by the Speaker, everybody having offered to vote who was present before the announcement, that announcement becomes, reasonably enough, a legal end of the matter, unless a reconsideration be moved. My attention was called to this point while the Speaker was delivering his very interesting ruling on Saturday——

Mr. MAYNARD. My associate on the Committee on the Rules has raised a point on which I would like to make a suggestion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to finish my statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] does not submit a point on which the Chair can with propriety rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point that my colleague be allowed to vote, and appeal to an authority higher than the rule.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I was without the bar when the last name on the roll was called; but I was under the impression——

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman within the bar at any time during the roll-call?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; I was not. But I was under the impression that I could vote at any time before the announcement of the result, and I did vote.

The SPEAKER. The rule is very distinct. It has been changed a great deal within recent years. Ten years ago the rule was that a member must be within the bar of the House when his own name was called.

Mr. GARFIELD. Or before the name following his was called.

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir. That gave a great advantage to gentlemen whose names were latest on the alphabet. The W's, Y's, and Z's, for instance, had a great advantage over the A's, B's, and C's. The rule was changed—the Chair thinks about eight years ago—so as to put all members on a level.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not make any point against the Speaker's ruling, but I call attention to this matter for the purpose of referring a resolution on the subject to the Committee on the Rules, who, I hope, will make a report upon the question, so that we may have a discussion of the subject in the House at some convenient time. I was about to say, when interrupted, that the very interesting ruling of the Speaker on Saturday last, upon a kindred point, namely, the example of Speaker Macon, (who insisted upon his constitutional right to vote, notwithstanding a rule of the House which declared that the Speaker should not vote except in case of tie,) raised this question in my mind: If the House, by the enactment of a rule, had no power to deprive the Speaker of his right to vote, is it not a violation of the constitutional right of a member for the House to prevent him from voting because he happens not to be in the Hall before the last name on the regular roll is called, though he may be in before a dozen other members have actually recorded their votes?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] overlooks another provision of the Constitution, and that is that this House may adopt rules for its government.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. A question has been raised as to the right of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] to vote.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio entirely overlooks another provision of the Constitution, which authorizes this House to make rules and to enforce those rules. And those rules must necessarily regulate the mode and manner of members voting.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that clause of the Constitution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

Mr. DAWES. The House must judge what are its proper rules. It must judge whether it is necessary for its government that its members shall vote in any particular way; and having so determined, it can impose any penalty it pleases in enforcing these rules under the Constitution. The Constitution authorizes the House so to do, and any rule which is reasonable and fair, and which cannot be treated as a perversion of the Constitution, it is certainly within the power of the House to pass.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist we have a rule here which is not reasonable. I recognize the power of the House to make rules, but those rules must not be inconsistent with the rights of members under the Constitution.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the House cannot by rule prevent the Speaker from voting, how, by parity of reasoning, can it prevent any other member of the House from voting?

Mr. DAWES. It would be competent for the House to say that if the Speaker of the House votes he shall vote at a particular time and in a particular way.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will observe this distinction, and there is no necessity for delay on this subject. The point presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in regard to his colleague [Mr. MONROE] is one involving the constitutional exercise by the House of its power to make rules. That, of course, the Chair could not rule upon; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] mistook the decision of the Chair on Saturday if he understood the Chair as assuming to rule on the constitutionality or propriety of any rule. He said that merely as introductory, en passant, in making his decision, which was based upon the language of existing rule. Whether a rule is absolutely right or not is not for the Chair to determine. It is the duty of the Chair to enforce the rule as he finds it. That is sufficient. It is the duty of the House to determine whether the rule is properly made.

At the same time, as the question is up, the Chair does not think this rule violates the constitutional right of any member; and the difference between the rule the gentleman points out in respect to the Speaker and this rule is this: This rule operates equally and impartially upon every member. There is no selection of one member and placing a disability upon him. The roll-call must cease at some time, and the House has determined it shall cease at a particular point. But if the House should say by a rule that the Representative of the third district of Maine should not vote, or the Representative of any other district, who happened to be a member of the House and elected Speaker, that presents a different case, because that attempts to disfranchise a single member from a right enjoyed by all other members, and therefore operates without equal and exact justice. This does not, in the opinion of the Chair, present that point, and therefore the Chair does not think (inasmuch as the question has been raised) the rule in the slightest degree affects the constitutional rights of any member.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent of the House to refer to the Committee on Rules a resolution on this subject, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the rules of the House that on a call of the ayes and noes members may vote at any time before the announcement of the result of the vote by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Of course there will be no objection to granting the gentleman that privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask it now.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is not the present rule an enlargement of the old parliamentary practice in reference to the right of members to vote?

The SPEAKER. It is an enlargement upon the old practice, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Chair has said that the old parliamentary rule required a member to be present when the question was put to the House, and that I believe is the rule of the House of Commons to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to know what is the ruling in favor of permission to the Speaker to exercise his representative capacity when his vote is necessary to make a two-thirds vote except he has only the same right given to every other member of the House. The ruling is that he has the right to vote when it is necessary to make up a two-thirds vote, and he does that merely as a member of the House having the same right with every other member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the right of the Speaker to vote on any question has never been questioned since the decision of Mr. Macon. He has just the same rights as any other member. And it is a mere matter of courtesy, in order to preserve the impartiality of the Chair, that keeps him from voting on every question that comes up.

Mr. RANDALL. I remember a case in which the immediate predecessor of the present occupant of the chair came down from the chair and voted, although his vote did not change the result.

Mr. MONROE. May I make a single remark?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MONROE. I had no wish to be the occasion of this question being pressed on the attention of the Speaker or of the House. I was detained a moment longer than I expected by a constituent. If I had been present I should have voted "no."

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make one single additional remark before the question is left. The question presented rests on two constitutional points. The yeas and nays are to be called on the demand of one-fifth of the members present, and the House has the right to determine the rule under which they shall be called. If the House should decide that the roll shall be called through, and when called through that the vote shall be announced and the absentees on the roll-call should not have the right to vote, the Chair thinks it would be an entire compliance with the Constitution in every respect.

Mr. MYERS. It has been suggested from time to time that a rule should be adopted for telegraphing our votes. This would carry out the idea of the Speaker; for as the name was called the vote would be telegraphed and the name would be read off afterward.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, rose to move a suspension of the rules, but yielded to Mr. SHELDON.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SHELDON, by unanimous consent, submitted an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to be considered as pending to the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 2342) in reference to the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi; and the same was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHELDON. I ask that by unanimous consent the amendment may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection.

It is as follows:

A bill for the construction of a canal from the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana, to the Gulf of Mexico.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, in the most expeditious manner, a thorough, detailed, and final survey and location of a canal from the Mississippi River, at some point below Fort Saint Philip, in the State of Louisiana, on the left bank, and terminating at some point most eligible in the deep waters of the Breton Harbor or Pass. The survey and report of the engineers assigned to this duty shall exhibit complete plans and specifications of the work in the construction of such canal, and the estimates of the cost of each portion of the work shall accompany and form part of the report of such survey; and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of such survey.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War shall, on the receipt of such report, and without unnecessary delay, advertise for bids to construct said canal as a whole, for such time, and in such newspapers as he may think sufficient; and he shall award the contract to the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, who shall give bond, with sureties to the satisfaction of said Secretary, that the work shall be done according to the stipulations of such contract: Provided, That no bid shall be received except the same is accompanied with a deposit with the said Secretary of the sum of $25,000, which sum shall be forfeited to the United States and paid into the Treasury thereof in case such bidder fails for a period of thirty days, after notice that his bid has been accepted, to make a contract in accordance with the terms of his bid and give security as required by this act: Provided further, That the contractor or contractors shall perform their work according to the plans and specifications of the Engineer Department, and under the directions thereof: And provided further, That said canal shall be fully completed for use within a period of three years from the day of contract, and that the entire cost of such canal shall not exceed the sum of $10,000,000.

SEC. 3. That the said canal shall not be less than two hundred feet wide on the bottom, and not less than twenty-seven feet deep, and shall have the proper locks, gates, waste-weirs, and other appurtenances necessary to facilitate the passage of ships to and from the said river and the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico; and it shall be so constructed in all respects as will make it a permanent channel; and the contractor or contractors shall be paid quarterly in 5 per cent. bonds, (gold interest, payable semi-annually,) which bonds are to run for forty years, 90 per cent. of the value of the work done and materials delivered, which shall be estimated and certified to by the officer of engineers in charge of the work upon actual and careful examination; and upon completion of contract the percentage reserved shall be paid to the contractor in like bonds, bearing date of the several estimates.

SEC. 4. That all the dredge-boats, implements, tools, machinery, and materials procured by any contractor for the construction of said canal, or any part thereof, shall be forfeited to the United States in case of failure of such contractor to comply with his contract; and the Secretary of War is required to take possession of and use the same in the construction of said canal whenever in his judgment any contractor has failed to comply with his contract; and no suit or proceeding by such contractor shall be entertained by any court that shall deprive the Secretary aforesaid of the use of such dredge-boats, implements, tools, machinery, and materials; and whenever any contractor shall fail as aforesaid, the said Secretary shall cause the work to be done by the Engineer Department, or let the same to other contractors in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That if said Secretary of War shall be unable to make contracts for the construction of said canal for a period of six months after receiving the report of the survey required by the first section of this act, he shall cause the Engineer Department to commence the construction of said canal without delay; and the same to be completed in the shortest period possible.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall execute bonds of the United States for such an amount as is necessary to defray the expenses of constructing said canal, in sums of $1,000 each, payable forty years from date, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. payable semi-annually, in gold coin, which bonds shall be delivered from time to time as is required by the provisions of this act: Provided, The entire sum shall not exceed $10,000,000; and in case the United States shall construct said canal in whole or in part, said bonds may be sold by said Secretary of the Treasury from time to time for not less than par, and the proceeds applied in defraying the expenses of such work.

SEC. 7. That when completed, the said canal and appurtenances shall be the property of the United States, and a free channel of commerce; and shall be under the control and management of the Secretary of War until otherwise provided by law.

SEC. 8. That if hereafter Congress shall make an appropriation of money to defray the expense of constructing said canal, the Secretary of War shall pay in money to the extent of such appropriation in lieu of bonds, and any bonds not delivered in consequence of such appropriation shall be canceled and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 9. That the said Eads and his associates may have the right to use any materials on the public lands of the United States in the vicinity of the mouth of the Mississippi River that may be needed in the construction of said works: Provided, That said right may be limited or withheld by the President of the United States, if he deems it contrary to the public interest.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That pending the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, in Committee of the Whole, it shall be in order to offer for consideration the following amendments:

No agent or employé of the United States Government, or of any of the Departments thereof, while in the service of the Government, shall have any interest, directly or indirectly, contingent or absolute, present or remote, in any contract made, or under negotiation, with the Government, or with the Indians, for the purchase or transportation or delivery of goods or supplies for the Indians, or for the removal of Indians; nor shall any such agent or employé collude with any person who may attempt to obtain any such contract for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain the same: Provided, This shall not be construed to prevent the making of such contracts by officers and agents of the Government duly and legally authorized to make such contracts. The violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and by removal from office; and in addition thereto the court shall in its discretion have the power to punish by imprisonment of not more than six months.

The offices of the following superintendents of Indian affairs are hereby abolished: The superintendents for Oregon, Washington Territory, New Mexico, California, Arizona, and Montana.

The following portion of section 8 of said bill:

Provided, That the amount set apart from the funds of each tribe shall be expended for the benefit of said tribe. But this proviso shall not be construed to prevent the conjunction of the funds of neighboring tribes, if necessary, in support of a school or schools, which shall be common to said tribes. And in case of vacancies in any Indian schools the children of tribes that have no annuities shall be entitled to privileges in said schools.

MONEYS PAID TO LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, which is moved with a view to the convenience of the Treasury Department:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to the resolution heretofore adopted by this House, requiring him to report the sums of money paid to certain land-grant railroads for the transportation of troops and property of the United States, transported since the 1st of January, 1866, be authorized and directed to make such report thereon as the convenience of his Department may justify during the present session, and that he be authorized to postpone making a full report thereon until the next session of this Congress.

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

LEGAL DAY'S WORK.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2976) to define a legal day's work in certain cases, and to fix a minimum rate of compensation therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS DUTIES ON FRUITS.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the House all correspondence between the Treasury Department and C. A. Arthur, collector of the port of New York, and George Bliss, jr., district attorney of said district of New York, relating to the refunding of customs duties on fruits, and copies of all orders given by the Treasury Department relating thereto.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

ARMY ORDER NO. 32.

Mr. NESMITH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be required to examine and report an opinion as to the authority under which General Order No. 32, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, Washington, March 15, 1873, was issued, and whether such order abridges the right of officers of the Army in freedom of speech and the right to petition Congress as citizens of the United States under the Constitution; and further, as to the authority of the Secretary of War over officers of the Army wholly retired from active service and unassignable under existing laws to any kind of military duty; and also to report whether the said order is in contravention of the exclusive right of Congress, under paragraph 13, section 8, article 7 of the Constitution, "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

WORK ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I now move that the rules be suspended and the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2653) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend work upon the public buildings, and that the same be passed.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to defer operations on any public buildings that are authorized by existing laws but not actually commenced, or to proceed with the same, as may, in his opinion, be for the best interests of the public service, and provides that all moneys heretofore appropriated for the construction of public buildings and now remaining to the credit of the same on the books of the Treasury Department, or which may hereafter be appropriated for such buildings, shall remain available until the completion of the work for which they are, or may be, appropriated; and that upon the final completion of each or any of said buildings, and the payment of all outstanding liabilities therefor, the balance or balances remaining shall be immediately covered into the Treasury.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it proposed to bring the bill before the House for consideration or to pass it?

The SPEAKER. To pass it.

The question being upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules, tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD, and Mr. PLATT of Virginia, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 75.

So the motion was seconded.

The question recurred upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have no objection at all to a discussion of this matter, and with the consent of the House I will modify my motion so as to bring the bill before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I ask unanimous consent to bring the bill before the House for consideration, the debate to be limited to half an hour.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I desire to ask a question. If this bill is defeated, will the appropriations still exist?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question, and the Chair does not know anything about it.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. PLATT, of Virginia; and there were—yeas 130, nays 93, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Begole, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clinton L. Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolfe—67.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

POLICE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether the police court of the District of Columbia has, under authority of the act entitled "An act to establish a police court for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1870, the power to try prosecutions for libel and misdemeanor without a jury, and whether any portion of said act is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States; and said committee shall report such a bill as may be necessary to secure the right of trial by jury in said court in such cases, and shall have leave to report at any time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1942) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Albert Ross to the active list of the Navy.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. STONE. I move that the rules be suspended and the preamble and resolution adopted which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it will be found that gross abuses and irregularities in the matter of mail contracts existing in the Post-Office Department of the United States, a portion of which will more fully appear by reference to Executive Document No. 322, Forty-second Congress, second session, of date May 17, 1872, and an examination of the bids for mail service from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1873, and from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, on mail-routes 7587, 7590, 7592, 7647, 8553, 8536, 8537, 8538, 8539, 8540, 8549, 8550, 8557, 8571, 8572, 8575, 8577, 8590, 8603, 8619, 8620, 8642, and 8646; that the aggregate bids for these mail-routes amounts to $48,490 per annum; that the lowest bidders failed to execute contracts, and that contracts were made with one F. P. Sawyer, of Washington, District of Columbia, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $439,469; that upon mail-routes 7524, 7612, and 7613 the bids amount to $2,350.01, and contracts were made with one Chidester for the sum of $14,522; that upon mail-routes 8006, 8007, 8010, 8013, and 8014 the bids amount to $25,700, and contracts were made with one Peterson aggregating the sum of $101,500; that upon mail-routes Nos. 7603, 7604, and 7605 the bids amount to $3,892, and contracts were made with one Vaile for the sum of $14,100; that upon mail-routes 8082 and 8083 the bids amount to $1,995, and contracts were made with one Davis for $16,050; that the bids upon mail-routes 7596, 7595, 7523, 7524, 7506, 6631, and 14846 aggregate the sum of $26,395, and that contracts were made with sundry persons named therein amounting to $102,549; that the bids for service on these several routes amount in the aggregate to $108,822.01 and that contracts were made for this service amounting to the sum of $688,190, in violation, as is alleged, of the Postal Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department; and whereas it will be found upon examination of the manuscript in possession of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that there has been paid to mail contractors $1,150,086.09 for services rendered for the quarter ending December 31, 1873, reported by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, and paid by the Postmaster-General, between December 30, 1873, and January 10, 1874, as is alleged, in violation of section 264, page 195, of the Postal Laws and Regulations, and section 508, page 244, of the Postal Laws and Regulations; and whereas it will be found from examination of the manuscript abstract No. 4, in possession of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that the mail-routes established or ordered during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, other than those let to contractors at the annual lettings, that the aggregate of the bids for mail service on routes Nos. 8642, 8646, 7590, 7592, and 10843 amounts to $8,597.74, and that contracts were made with one Sawyer for $40,381.50; that the bids for mail service on routes 7521, 7612, 7613, 7517, 7521, 7612, 7613, 7624, 7636, 7645, and 7598 amount to $9,544.75, and contracts were awarded to one Chidester for the sum of $42,998; and that bids for mail service on mail-routes Nos. 14935, 6061, 6781, 6648, 8082, 8526, 7603, 7648, 7524, 7522, 7525, 7594, 7596, 10843, and 14905 amount to $22,298 and that contracts were awarded to sundry persons for the sum of $93,651; that the aggregate bids for the mail service on the foregoing routes amounts to $40,440.49, and that contracts were made for this service for the sum of $177,030.50, as is alleged, in violation of the Postal Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department; and whereas it will be found upon examination of manuscript Report No. 5, in possession of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that service on mail-route No. 8031 was for twice a week, at an annual sum of $3,900; that the service was expedited to six miles an hour and one additional trip per week, for which the contract price was increased $12,918.13; that the service on mail-route No. 8067 was for twice a week, at an annual sum of $5,980; that the service was expedited to five miles an hour, for which an additional sum of $7,840.45 is paid: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and are hereby, instructed to make a thorough examination into the operations of the Post-Office Department, and to make to this House at the earliest possible moment a full report of their investigation, together with the testimony taken by them; and to that end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and, if deemed necessary by them, to employ an additional clerk and short-hand reporter; and that the said investigation shall be held publicly.

During the reading of the preamble

Mr. G. F. HOAR said: I rise to a question of order. How are this preamble and resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. They were introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STONE,] by consent of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] who yielded to him for that purpose.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I might as well move "to suspend the rules and make the following speech," and then go on and give the speech.

Mr. STONE. Gentlemen have sent up bills to the Clerk's desk that have taken fifteen or twenty minutes to read. I can read this in five minutes, and yet gentlemen object to a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. TYNER. It is something more than a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. PACKER. The gentleman who offers this has had ample opportunity to make charges of this kind before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The matter is undergoing investigation, and is now being considered by that committee.

Mr. STONE. I object to debate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object to the further reading of statements and argumentation in this preamble, because it is in the nature of debate, giving reasons why members should vote so and so upon the subject-matter.

Mr. RANDALL. It is immaterial if not true, and very material if true.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not stop the reading on the point of order, although he will not say it is not well taken. The House will observe that this winds up with a resolution instructing the committee to investigate facts which the mover alleges to be true. The Chair cannot admit that the paper is in the ordinary form; it is in very extraordinary form.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a very extraordinary case.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter which the gentleman desires to have investigated. He sets out in the preamble with a statement that the facts are so and so, and then asks that an investigation be had.

Mr. STONE. I will change it from "it will be found" to "it is alleged," if that will make any difference.

The SPEAKER. That makes a great difference.

Mr. STONE. The facts are the same, and will be found so on an investigation. I did not choose to come before the House with a resolution instructing the committee unless I had something to direct the committee to act upon.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be so suspended that it may be read by its title.

The SPEAKER. The shortest way will be to read it through.

The reading was then concluded.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. PACKER and Mr. STONE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—yeas 72, noes 87.

So the motion was not seconded.

Mr. STOWELL. I desire to state that the Post-Office Committee have given the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] an opportunity to appear before them to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Clerk will record the fact that every democratic vote was given in favor of this inquiry and every republican vote against it. Thank God for that!

Mr. STONE. I now ask that the preamble and resolution be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And I ask that they be printed.

Mr. PAGE and others objected.

Mr. PACKER. I desire to say that if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will strike out the preamble which contains these charges there will be no objection at all to the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER,] chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, suggests that the resolution directing the investigation (without the preamble assuming the charges to be true) may be adopted. Is there objection?

Several MEMBERS. None.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be adopted without the preamble, which assumes the charge to be true.

Mr. BECK. The preamble does not so assume.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I insist on having the preamble and resolution printed.

Several members objected.

Mr. SPEER. I ask that the resolution be read, so that we may see whether, apart from the preamble, it refers anything to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and are hereby, instructed to make a thorough examination into the operations of the Post-Office Department, and to make to this House at the earliest possible moment a full report of their investigation, together with the testimony taken by them; and to that end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and, if deemed necessary by them, to employ an additional clerk and short-hand reporter; and that the said investigation shall be held publicly.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, I ask that the preamble and resolution may be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. PAGE] objects.

Mr. LUTTRELL. What gentleman from California objects?

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Were not the preamble and resolution read by consent of the House, and do they not, by virtue of that fact, go into the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. They do; and also into the Journal.

Several MEMBERS. That is all that is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declined, upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] to prohibit the reading of the preamble, but he said he would not have it understood that it might not be ruled out. The Chair sees no such connection between the preamble and the resolution as would have enabled the preamble, on strict construction of the rules, to be introduced; because the resolution does not recite the preamble; it stands as a distinct substantive proposition, having no connection with the preamble. But the Chair did not desire to have it ruled out on the point of order, although his opinion is that it was not properly a part of the resolution.

Mr. DURHAM. I make the point of order that there was no objection——

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order for the gentleman to make. The preamble and resolution will appear in the RECORD and the Journal. The Chair simply desired to place himself right. He did not rule out the preamble, although, according to strict parliamentary law, he ought to have done so.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say that information, emanating as I understand from my colleague, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] has reached my own State through the associated press of the country, that an investiga tion has been going on for the last two weeks before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in reference to this very subject.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to say that I know nothing about any such dispatch; and the gentleman has no authority for his assertion. He is very sensitive on these questions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that to make a preamble in order, it must connect itself directly and necessarily with the resolution; and gentlemen will have observed, from the reading of this resolution, that it is a substantive, independent proposition, not reciting the preamble, nor referring to it in any way.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to make an explanation to this House. I think it is the duty of the House to listen to it; and I think that this explanation should be made now.

Over two weeks ago my colleague [Mr. LUTTRELL] came before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads preferring certain charges. He was requested by the committee to submit his charges in writing and sign them.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Did I not do so?

Mr. PAGE. My colleague must excuse me. He came there at different times when the committee was not in session—when no quorum was present. Immediately telegrams were sent out to California stating that Mr. LUTTRELL was endeavoring to get an investigation before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and that he could not obtain a hearing; which was false.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is untrue.

Mr. PAGE. About a week ago he was requested to submit those charges to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which he has done. It was then agreed that on Tuesday, that is to-morrow morning, my colleague [Mr. LUTTRELL] with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] should appear before that committee and make and substantiate the charges contained in their written statements. They have appeared here to-day to ask the House to take cognizance of what the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are prepared to go on with.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I wish to say this to the House: The gentleman is very sensitive on all these questions. I stated to him and to the committee that serious charges had been preferred to me about certain post-office transactions. I was not disposed to, and I did not, implicate the Postmaster-General. I believe he was innocent; but I do believe that a post-office ring has been formed which has defrauded the Government of the United States of thousands and thousands of dollars during the last year. I stated that it was the common talk all around the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I went before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads as I had agreed to, but the gentlemen of the committee did not put in an appearance and there was no quorum. One member of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] told me to come back on another occasion, and I have acted strictly in accordance with his request.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] whether we did not send for him? [Cries of "Order."]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not be interrupted.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I acted strictly in accordance with the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and appeared before the committee and filed my charges. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has filed similar charges to-day; and we make these charges, Mr. Speaker, from the post-office books. We have the books to produce. And let me say here that I make these charges on the authority of the very best men in my State. I make them on the authority of the very best republicans in my State—republicans, too, Mr. Speaker, who would be ashamed of the action of my colleague here to-day. I make them in behalf of republicans of California who stand firm to their party—republicans, sir, who are honest in heart and sentiment, who have stood by the country in days gone by and who intend to stand by it in the future.

Mr. PAGE. That is something more than was ever done by my colleague.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is the class of men I am representing. I have stated to the gentleman who they were.

Mr. PAGE. Which political party does my colleague represent on this floor?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I represent the workingmen of California, not the railroad "ring." I am against all the "rings." I represent the honest, hard-working people of California.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask my colleague what political party he represents on this floor?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I represent the democratic party—Newton Booth and the toiling, the hard-working men of California, which my colleague dare not say he does. I do not come here with the Leland Sanford and the Pacific Railroad collar around my neck labeled with the badge of monopolies. I come here a workingman and as the representative of workingmen irrespective of party. I tell my colleague and I tell the House that if the republican party here means to put down corruption, then I am for the republican party; but if it does not mean to put down corruption and fraud on the Government, but on the contrary to uphold these "rings," then I am against it.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to be heard. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. McNULTA. Hear him.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the regular order of business. Each side has had its chance to be heard.

Mr. SENER. Hear both sides.

Mr. PAGE. I ask to be heard.

Mr. McNULTA. Hear him.

Mr. ATKINS. Both sides have been heard.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to what I believe to be a privileged motion. I move that the preamble be not printed in the RECORD, and I move to suspend the rules if necessary for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion, as he has already recognized the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] who has the floor on a motion to suspend the rules. The Chair understood the resolution to be unanimously agreed to, the preamble having been withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Was the resolution withdrawn from the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. Not from the RECORD, but from action.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It should be withdrawn from the RECORD.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understood the Chair to state that the resolution was agreed to unanimously, but that was not my understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts states it was not his understanding that the resolution was agreed to unanimously. It will be again read.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to be heard for a few minutes.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the gentleman's going on if opportunity be given for reply.

Mr. PAGE. I will endeavor to make it a reply to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I do not object if the gentleman's colleague has an opportunity to reply to his speech.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not yield further.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk to be read a telegram published in one of the California papers.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to say that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE,] did not withdraw the preamble to the resolution, as the Chair stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that neither the preamble nor the resolution is before the House, because the House refused to second the motion for the suspension of the rules. Then the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads suggested that the resolution, which was the only thing that proposed action, should be agreed to. And to that the Chair heard no objection.

Mr. DAWES. The resolution was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] proposed the resolution himself. The preamble and resolution, so far as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] had offered them, were not before the House, because the House refused to second the motion for suspending the rules.

Mr. POTTER. That is as I understand it. But it is nevertheless true that the gentleman from Missouri did not withdraw the preamble to his resolution, and he desires to have it so understood.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair is not mistaken as to the fact that the gentleman from Missouri indicated his assent to the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. STONE. My proposition was to refer the whole matter to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I heard no objection to that; but I did not agree to the withdrawal of the preamble.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman object to the resolution being passed without the preamble?

Mr. STONE. I did not.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair furthermore understood the gentleman by a nod of the head to assent to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that the resolution should be agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I did.

The SPEAKER. Then of course the gentleman did as the Chair has stated.

Mr. STONE. I do not see it in that light.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee can take cognizance of the preamble as it will be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make no objection to the resolution if it can be limited to the State of California, or such territory as the gentleman may specify. But I should think no gentleman in the House would assent to a resolution so broad as I understand this to be. I ask that it be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and they are hereby, instructed to make a thorough examination into the operations of the Post-Office Department and to make to this House at the earliest moment a full report of their investigation, together with the testimony taken by them; and to that end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and, if deemed necessary by them, to employ an additional clerk and short-hand reporter, and that the said investigation shall be held publicly.

Mr. PACKER. The resolution ought to be limited to the mail letting.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that both the resolution and preamble be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that they may report on them.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be referred, striking out the portion in regard to an additional clerk and short-hand reporter.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. The Chair announced that the resolution, without the preamble, had been passed by unanimous consent. A debate arose; and I submit that it is now too late for the gentleman to object.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. If the Chair in the confusion did not hear the gentleman object, and the gentleman states that he did object, it is not too late.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I am recognized for the purpose, I would move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution and preamble be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say a word in justice to the committee.

Mr. PAGE. I object. I desire to make a remark in answer to my colleague from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] and it is objected to on that side of the House.

Mr. TYNER. I appeal to the gentleman from California to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to make a statement, for the reason that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a member of the committee of the last Congress which had the same question under consideration.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. TYNER. I wish the House to consent that I may be heard for not over two minutes after the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have been heard.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say but one word in connection with this. I, of course, do not know whether these charges are true or false. It is stated that the proof of them is to be found in official documents. But I do wish to say one word in justice to the committee. I believe there is no man on that committee who is not willing to give this subject a full, fair, and thorough investigation. I was a member also of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads during the last Congress. There was at that time an investigation touching some of these matters, and the committee were divided six to three. Six—the majority of the committee; that is, the republican side of it—rather sustained the Postmaster-General, and proposed certain legislation, which was subsequently adopted by Congress. But the three democrats, the minority of the committee, dissented from the conclusion and from the exoneration of the Post-Office Department in that particular.

Mr. BECK. Was the testimony ever printed?

Mr. RANDALL. The testimony was not printed, but the two reports will be found in a public document of last Congress, No. 38.

Mr. TYNER. I desire the attention of the House for but a moment. I also was a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the last Congress, and was present during the entire investigation to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has alluded. The charges came from a former member of this House, a gentleman, I believe, of the name of McKibben. A very thorough and searching investigation into nearly all the matters that were stated in the preamble to this resolution was made by that committee. I state, as my recollection of the facts, that the investigation was itself abandoned by the complainant, and that all the gentlemen of the committee agreed to the fact that while there might have been some rascalities and frauds committed upon the Treasury of the United States, yet there was no stain whatever upon the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RANDALL. Suppose you read the minority report, and see if there are no reflections on the Post-Office Department.

Mr. TYNER. I have the report here, and I will refer to it in a moment. I only stated my recollection, and of course I may be mistaken. But I am satisfied that the investigation did develop the fact that there was a ring, which you may call "the post-office ring," and which did not embrace within it any person connected with the Post-Office Department, who had been committing frauds on the Treasury through the medium and instrumentality of what are known as straw bids. Gross frauds evidently were committed, but I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will agree with me in saying that the proof before the committee did not show that any gentleman in the Post-Office Department was connected with those frauds.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to be understood as charging that the Postmaster-General was in any manner implicated in corruption; but I do say that the minority report, and I think justly, reflected on his management of the Post-Office Department, and that the whole committee thought that legislation was necessary so as to place it beyond the power of any Postmaster-General in the future to permit such things to be done.

Mr. TYNER. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that investigation satisfied the committee of the necessity of changing the law in relation to the acceptance of bids, and the result was a passage of a law by the last Congress which has to a very considerable extent cut off what is known as straw bidding.

Now, sir, when the preamble to the resolution was first presented to the House I suggested that it was something more than a resolution of inquiry, and objected to its consideration; and I voted with the majority in refusing to have it considered by the House; not because I did not want an investigation, but simply because I knew that the statements made in the preamble to the resolution were not warranted by the facts. But was willing that the whole subject should be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I approved of that action, and hope that that committee will thoroughly investigate the facts that may come before it.

One word more. I have here the report that was made during the last Congress upon this subject, and if the House will bear with me I will read it myself. It has reference to the whole subject which is embraced in what is known as the temporary service. Gentlemen suggest that I should send it to the Clerk's desk to be read, and I will do so and ask the Clerk to read the passage which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is not disputed that the Postmaster-General made the best terms for the Government for this temporary service which were obtainable. This service is generally being performed by the last regular contractors, who, having the lines or routes already stocked and organized, possess great advantages over other parties in proposals for brief or uncertain periods of service. And the complaint against the Postmaster-General seems to be that he "ought to have taken the responsibility of contracting with the lowest bidder who would take the contract and perform the service for the term," after the lowest or "straw" bidder had failed, and that "he should not have sought the opinion of the Attorney-General, nor observed it when obtained," &c.

The committee failed to arrive at that conclusion, and though it seems pretty certain that the Postmaster-General might have contracted with somebody, in most cases, for the term, at less rates than he contracted for the temporary service, the committee believe that no officer of the Government could be justified in a violation of the law at his own option, because, in his opinion, he might thereby save money to the Government. Such a rule of duty once established for officers of the Government, the license of discretion once substituted for the rule of law, and there would be no such thing as accountability by the public servants.

The committee are therefore of opinion that the course pursued by the Postmaster-General was not only justified by the circumstances and law, but was eminently wise and prudent.

The Attorney-General of the United States is the law expositor and organ of the Government, and until his opinions are overthrown or reversed by the courts, they are regarded as authority by the different Departments of the Government.

The committee have, as the practical result of their labors in this investigation, reported a bill which passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote, and which they believe, if enacted into a law, will in great measure, if not entirely, remedy the evil which is the subject of this report.

JAS. N. TYNER.
S. O. HOUGHTON.
GINERY TWICHELL.
CHARLES H. PORTER.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask now that the minority report may be read.

Mr. TYNER. One word more and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. BECK. I want to ask the gentleman a single question, and it is, why was not the testimony taken by the committee of the last Congress printed?

Mr. TYNER. I will answer that by saying to the gentleman that my recollection is that none of the committee thought it worth while to print the testimony. The complaint was abandoned.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the minority report.

Mr. TYNER. A single word more. My recollection is that the only point of difference between the majority and the minority of the committee was simply this: that the minority of the committee did not believe that the Postmaster-General had violated the law in the acceptance of bids; but that he ought to have taken the responsibility of preventing the letting of certain routes.

Mr. RANDALL. He ought to have stopped the plundering of the Treasury which these straw bids have been the cause of.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman may use that language if he is disposed to do so.

Mr. CONGER. I object to this political quarrel going on any further.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not a political quarrel.

Mr. STONE. I desire to put myself right. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] has asserted that what was in the preamble to the resolution was untrue. I hurl back that charge, and say that it is true, and I hold in my hand a document which will prove every word of it.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman from Indiana did not make such a statement, or if he did it was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. STONE. You made that assertion.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Indiana said that he opposed the resolution because he knew that the facts stated in the preamble were not established by the investigation during the last Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask, as an act of justice to the minority of the committee, that their conclusion be also read; it is very short.

The Clerk read as follows:

In conclusion, the minority of the committee, in presenting this report to Congress, are compelled to state from the evidence that the system of fraudulent or straw bidding has grown to its full volume under this Administration. They believe that it is the direct result of excessive and unreasonable contracts given out by the Post-Office Department. They consider the refutation of the statement of Mr. Creswell, that he acted under the opinion of the Attorney-General, as complete, and they believe that opinion was obtained after the Postmaster-General had determined to change the practice of the Department, and now offered as an excuse and apparent justification therefor. They believe his action without justification in refusing to entertain the bids of reasonable contractors, which he could do under the established usage of the Department. They believe his violation of the law in the Oroville and Portland letting is proven beyond any doubt. They believe unreasonable expenditure in the land routes to be fully established, and unnecessary and expensive service to have been established betwen New Orleans and Shreveport. They consider that, if the laws and regulations can be violated to save the money of the Government, the Postmaster-General is estopped from pleading them to justify extravagance in other cases; and while they are necessarily restricted in presenting the evidence, they believe that they have adduced sufficient to satisfy Congress that the Postmaster-General has so administered the affairs of the Post-Office Department as to at least merit their censure.

P. VAN TRUMP.
SAM'L J. RANDALL.
JOHN M. CARROLL.

Mr. PACKER. I desire to say, on behalf of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the present House, that they have furnished every facility to the gentlemen preferring these charges to substantiate them by evidence. The committee have shut out nothing which those gentlemen asked to present, and they have given them an attentive hearing every time they appeared before them.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to corroborate that statement.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is so; no one finds fault with the committee in that respect.

Mr. PAGE. I hold in my hand a telegraphic dispatch, sent at the instance of my colleague, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] in which it is stated that those gentlemen had consulted with the Postmaster-General in reference to these matters; that he acknowledged that the Department had committed a wrong, and at their request he would do no such wrong any more.

Mr. LUTTRELL. You have no right to make the statement that that dispatch was sent at my instance.

Mr. PAGE. That dispatch was sent out before my colleague submitted his charges at all.

Mr. STOWELL. And when he submitted his charges and we asked him to sign them he refused to do so.

Mr. PAGE. (to Mr. LUTTRELL.) Do you vouch for these charges?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Are you not a contractor, and so recorded here?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That accounts for the milk in the cocoa-nut.

Mr. PAGE. And I have a right to be.

Mr. LUTTRELL. No, sir; you have no right to be.

Mr. PAGE. Whenever the gentleman wants to discuss my right to be so, he can do so before the House. I ask that this dispatch be read.

Mr. BECK. I object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the preamble and resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads without being adopted.

No objection was made.

PROTECTION OF THE TEXAS FRONTIER.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move that the rules be so suspended as to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of House bill No. 1590, to provide for the better protection of the frontier settlements of Texas against Indian and Mexican depredations, and that the same be passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the bill being read?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I do.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have not yielded the floor for a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has submitted his motion for a suspension of the rules, and the rule provides that pending that motion one motion to adjourn shall be in order.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 122, noes 74.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. MCNULTA called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; there being only 22 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask leave to submit a resolution, to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I object.

The vote on the motion of Mr. ALBRIGHT was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 14, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON. I present the memorial of the Union League Club of the city of New York in the form of resolutions, in which they disapprove of the further inflation of the currency as a violation of all the rules of finance and as contrary to the pledges of Congress to the people of the nation. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented the petition of C. D. Anderson, of Texas, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition and accompanying documents of David R. Haggart, late colonel Fifth Kentucky Infantry, in support of his claim for pay as an officer of the Army during the late rebellion from the 1st of October, 1861, to March 31, 1862; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PEASE. I present a petition of a large number of citizens of Mississippi, asking the Congress of the United States to refund the tax collected on cotton by the Federal Government during the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868. I desire that the petition be read, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that a Senator shall make a brief statement of the contents of a petition presented by him. It will be referred to the Committee on Claims, as a matter of course.

Mr. PEASE. I suppose I have sufficiently stated the object of the claim. I ask its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be so referred.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying for the repeal of the law authorizing grants of public lands for city and town sites; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for an order for the withdrawal of the papers in the case of Isaac W. Ingersoll and Joseph Granger. There has been an adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it for the purpose of reference to another committee?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. To be referred in the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered, copies being retained.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2090) for the relief of Jacob Harding, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 312) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 575) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Finance instruct me to report back the bill (S. No. 393) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The title of this bill does not give an accurate index of its purpose. It is to provide for proceedings against insolvent banks and banks that have gone into liquidation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the same committee to report back the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and to recommend concurrence in the substitute adopted by the House, with several amendments. It is accompanied with a written report, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed, and the bill go upon the Calendar.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2416) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expenses incurred by the States of Oregon and California in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1872 and 1873, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2698) for the relief of Joseph C. Breckinridge, for services in the Army of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 481) for the relief of Thomas Weeks, of Plymouth, Wisconsin, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1771) for the relief of Rice M. Brown, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Montana Territory, asking protection to the citizens of Deer Lodge and Missoula Counties against the depredations of roving bands of Indians, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Secretary of War for his consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866, to report it with an amendment, with a recommendation from the majority of the committee that the bill pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

JAMES B. BETTS.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 326) for the delivery to James B. Betts, receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States of America, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment; and I ask for its present consideration if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver up to James B. Betts, receiver of the president, directors, and company of the State Bank of Charleston, South Carolina, the following coupon bonds now in the Treasury of the United States: Bonds numbered 812, 821, 836, and 837, each for the sum of $1,000, issued by the State of South Carolina in aid of the Blue Ridge Railroad Company, signed by R. F. W. Allston, governor, and T. I. Pickens, comptroller-general, under an act of the General Assembly of that State, ratified on the 21st day of December, 1854, which were the property of the president, directors, and company of the State Bank, to be administered by Betts as he may be directed by the proper court in South Carolina, under which he holds the appointment of receiver.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert as an additional section the following:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay unto the said James B. Betts, receiver of the State Bank of Charleston, South Carolina, the sum of $479, that being the amount heretofore collected by the Secretary of the Treasury from the said State upon coupons attached to said bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM ROOD.

Mr. KELLY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, to report the same back without amendment; and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which is a direction to the Adjutant-General of the Army to remove the charge of desertion from the name of William Rood, late private Company E, Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, in view of his death while in service; and a provision that the father of William Rood shall be allowed and paid the pay and benefits and advantages due him, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the charge of desertion had never been made, and application therefor had been filed before the 30th of January, 1873.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 695) granting a pension to Sue Bradley Johnson, widow of General G. L. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPENCER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 696) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication and determination a claim for the past and future use of an invention and letters-patent thereon now in general use by the Post-Office Department in the postal service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 697) to incorporate the Washington City and Atlantic Coast Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 698) to establish a national railroad bureau and for the general government of railroads; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. The Secretary of the Interior has transmitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill to regulate bids for goods, supplies, and transportation on account of the Indian service. I ask leave to introduce this bill, and that it may be read, and, with the accompanying communication, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 699) to regulate bids for goods, supplies, and transportation on account of the Indian service; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying communication, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 700) for the relief of Robert Love; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MENNONITE SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask consent to call up the bill (S. No. 655) to enable the Mennonites from Russia to effect permanent settlement on the public lands of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof insert:

That whenever a body of such persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, shall, through a duly constituted and accredited agent, file with the Secretary of the Interior an application for permission to locate a portion of the public lands of the United States, accompanying such application with a list of the persons composing such body and the quantity desired by each, the Secretary may authorize such location to be made in any land district of the United States by giving such agent the proper certificate in writing, under seal of his office, stating that such application has been filed, and reciting the number of persons so applying and the number of acres which they may include in their claim, and location to be made as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That upon presentation of the certificate aforesaid to the register of any land district such agent as aforesaid shall be permitted to locate in a compact body any tract of unappropriated public land not mineral, and not exceeding the amount of one hundred and sixty acres, held at the minimum price, or eighty acres held at the double-minimum price, for each person composing such body of individuals named in the said petition and application: Provided, That no prior right of any person under existing laws shall be prejudiced by this act.

SEC. 3. That such location shall be made by filing with the register a declaratory statement, describing the lands by sectional subdivision, township, and range, and the payment to the receiver of fees at the rate of one dollar, each, to the register and receiver for each one hundred and sixty acres embraced in the application, to be accounted for as other fees and allowances, and subject to the restrictions under existing laws as to maximum compensation of those officers. And upon receipt of such fees, the receiver shall issue his receipt therefor, setting forth the fact of such declaratory statement having been filed, giving the number of the same, and the description of the land, and acknowledging the said payment of the fees as aforesaid; which receipt shall be delivered to such agent, and shall be his voucher for the filing of the declaratory statement and payment of the fees aforesaid.

SEC. 4. That the register shall forward to the General Land Office, as a portion of his monthly returns, a duly certified abstract of the declaratory statement, in the same manner as similar returns are rendered in pre-emption cases, to be entered upon the books of the General Land Office.

SEC. 5. That any person named in the application and petition on file with the Secretary of the Interior, or, if he be dead, his legal representatives, shall have the exclusive right of entry for the period of two years from the date of filing as aforesaid, under the laws of the United States existing at the date of entry, of a tract of land embraced in said declaratory statement, not exceeding the quantity named in the original application and petition, as the amount desired by such person, and in no case exceeding one hundred and sixty acres of minimum or eighty acres of double-minimum lands.

SEC. 6. That all questions of priority arising between actual settlers shall be adjusted under existing rules.

SEC. 7. That at the expiration of the period of two years, as aforesaid, all lands not entered by the parties entitled under the foregoing provisions shall be subject to the entry of any other person under the laws applicable to the same as other public lands of the United States.

SEC. 8. That the aggregate of lands held under declaratory statements, as aforesaid, shall not, at any one time, exceed five hundred thousand acres, nor shall any one filing embrace more than one hundred thousand acres.

SEC. 9. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. WINDOM. I will make a very brief statement in reference to this bill. It has received the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Public Lands, who have given to it careful consideration. Its object is to enable some forty or fifty thousand people, known as Mennonites, and who now reside in Southern Russia, in the neighborhood of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof, to take possession of certain public lands for settlement. Those people are farmers; industrious, intelligent, and in every respect the class of people most desired in this country. They were originally Germans who went to Russia at the instance of Catherine II, who offered to them certain inducements to settle upon and improve the lands of that country.

The reason why it is necessary to pass some such bill as this is that those people are unable to sell their lands at once on account of a provision made by the government of Russia which at the time was supposed to be for their benefit, namely, that their lands should never be sold to any one but members of their own sect. It operated very advantageously while they desired to stay, as Russians could not settle among them, and their community was entirely separate from that in which they then resided. But now that they desire to remove to this country, it operates very disadvantageously. Of course, if the whole amount of their land is thrown into the market at once, it will be impossible for them to realize its value. Their purpose is to come here in small bodies as fast as they can make sales of portions of their lands, and the desire is to send over agents representing these bodies who will appear before the Secretary of the Interior, state the number and names of the persons who will compose the body about to emigrate, and receive from the Secretary a certificate that an application has been made for public lands for a given number of persons. That certificate, when taken to the local land office, will enable them to make selections of not more than one hundred thousand acres of land in a body at any one time, to be reserved for them two years in order to enable them to make their arrangements to come and take possession of it.

I think it is utterly impossible for us to procure this valuable accession to our population unless we make some such provision as this. The Canadian government is extremely anxious to obtain these settlers, and has offered them very great advantages if they will take lands in the western part of the Dominion, in Manitoba. I will read, if the Senate please, the offer made by the Canadian government:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, OTTAWA, July 23, 1873.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor, under instruction of the minister of agriculture, to state to you, in reply to your letter of this day's date, the following facts relating to advantages offered to settlers, and to the immunities afforded to Mennonites, which are established by the statute law of Canada and by order of his excellency the governor general, in council, for the information of German Mennonites having intention to emigrate to Canada via Hamburg.

First. An entire exemption from military service is by law and order in council granted to the denonination of Christians called Mennonites.

Second. An order in council was passed on the 3d of March last to reserve eight townships in the province of Manitoba for free grants, on the condition of settlement, as provided in the Dominion land act, that is to say:

"Any person who is the head of a family, or has attained the age of twenty-one years, shall be entitled to be entered for one-quarter section or a less quantity of unappropriated Dominion lands, for the purpose of securing a homestead right in respect thereof."

Third. The said reserve of eight townships is for the exclusive use of the Mennonites, and the said free grants of one-quarter of a section, to consist of one hundred and sixty acres each, as fixed by the act.

Fourth. Should the Mennonite settlement extend beyond the eight townships set aside by the order in council of March 3 last, other townships will be in the same way reserved to meet the full requirements of the Mennonite emigration.

Fifth. If next spring the Mennonite settlers, in viewing the eight townships set aside for their use, should prefer to exchange them for any other unoccupied townships, such exchange will be allowed.

Sixth. In addition to the free grant of a quarter-section of land, or one hundred and sixty acres, to every person over twenty-one years of age, on the condition of settlement, the right to purchase the remaining three-quarters of the section at one dollar per acre is granted by law, so as to complete the whole section of six hundred and forty acres, which is the largest quantity of land the government will grant a patent for to one person.

Seventh. The settler will receive a patent for a free grant after three years' residence, in accordance with the terms of the Dominion land act.

Eighth. In the event of the death of the settler the lawful heirs can claim the patent for the free grant, upon proof that settlement duties for three years have been performed.

Ninth. From the moment of occupation the settlement acquires a "homestead right" in the land.

Tenth. The fullest privilege of exercising their religious principles is by law afforded to the Mennonites without any kind of molestation or restriction whatever, and the same privilege extends to the education of their children in schools.

Eleventh. The privilege of "affirming," instead of making "affidavits," is afforded by law.

Twelfth. The government of Canada will undertake to furnish the passenger warrants from Hamburg to Fort Garry for Mennonite families of good character.

for the sum of thirty dollars per adult person over the age of eight years; for persons under eight years, half price, or fifteen dollars, and for infants under one year, three dollars.

Thirteenth. The minister specially authorizes me to state that this arrangement as to price shall not be changed for the seasons 1874, 1875, and 1876.

Fourteenth. I am further to state that if it is changed thereafter the price shall not, up to the year 1882, exceed forty dollars for adults, and children in proportion, subject to the approval of Parliament.

Fifteenth. The immigrants will be provided with provisions on the portion of the journey between Liverpool and Collingwood, but during other portions of the journey they are to find their own provisions.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

J. N. LOWE,
Secretary of Department of Agriculture.

The Senate will have observed by the reading of this that the inducements offered by Canada are very much greater than these people ask to be offered by this country. They may take six hundred and forty acres in Canada at the rate of one dollar per acre for three-fourths of it and take as a homestead the other one-fourth. All they ask of this country is that they may have the opportunity of making the selection of lands; that they may be withheld for them for two years in order that they may send over their agents to build their houses and prepare the farms, so that when the bulk of the body arrive they may find their homes all ready for their occupation. They prefer our country, and unless we choose to drive away forty thousand of the very best farmers of Russia who are now competing with us in the markets of the world with some ten million bushels of their wheat, if we choose to say that Russia shall raise that wheat or that Canada shall provide it instead of our own country, we can simply reject the proffer of these people, and they probably will not become our citizens. I deem it of the utmost importance that this bill should pass.

I will say one word more, Mr. President. It is not the intention of these people to come in one body and take possession of large tracts of land, as has been supposed. They pursue different avocations at home. Some of them are farmers; some of them are wool-growers; others are engaged in manufactures and the various pursuits which make a rich and prosperous community. It is possible that the farmers will go to the Northwest; that the wheat-raisers will find in Minnesota or Dakota or Nebraska, or that region of country, the best place for their pursuits, while the wool-growers will probably go farther South, and so throughout the country they will be distributed in small bodies in what I deem an entirely unobjectionable manner.

I will not take up the time of the Senate further in this connection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is certainly a very important bill. I do not think that American history has furnished a precedent for a bill of this character. I do not believe that it ever occurred to the founders of this Government, or to those who have administered it heretofore, that the highest public policy—by which I mean the best progress of the Republic—would tolerate a species of legislation of this character, either for Mormon or Shaker or Baptist or Episcopalian, or any religious or political sect or band of people whatever. To me it is a question entirely independent of what these people may think, or what any other community of people may think, upon any religious or political or social topic. It is the question which, as I believe, is fundamental to successful republicanism, that of a homogeneous unity of the whole body of the citizens of a State divided into political parties, divided into sects, divided into social grades, if you please, but all in the body of the community living as friends and neighbors among each other, and not separated by any territorial or other distinctions from each other; so that when you look at the party in his character as a citizen and as a resident, you are not to look in Vermont for the Congregationalist, and in New York for the Episcopalian, and in Indiana for the Baptist, and in Oregon for another sect; you are not to look in New England for the republican in the political and the party sense, and in the West and in the South for the democrat in the political and the party sense; but if you are to have a prosperous republic you must look everywhere in the whole boundaries of the nation to find everywhere every shade of political and religious opinion which citizens may entertain, which shall not interfere with the places where they reside or the standing or position they are to have in the communities among whom they may be located.

I believe, sir, that human experience demonstrates that it is impossible that a republican Government shall be successful, that it shall live, if it be based upon any other principle than that I have named. Why, sir, what kind of a country should we be if distinctions prevailed such as this bill proposes to set up, of locating men of special religious or special political or social ideas exclusively in one place and another exclusively in another, and so on? Suppose it were by States, then you would have a representation here which would be absolutely fatal, in my humble opinion, to that successful administration and legislation respecting affairs which shall look to the common interests of all citizens, and which, because they are commingled in every respect, are common to all, and only because so, rather than looking to the exclusive and single interests of one State to do one thing and another State to do another, and so on.

Suppose, Mr. President, that all the blacksmiths were located in New England; of course I am not speaking of the physical inconvenience of having them all there; but I will not carry on the illustration of the blacksmiths because, of course, that is absurd, as anybody would see. Suppose, however, all the manufacturers of woolen cloths were to be by law allowed and required in effect, or from their own notion they had banded together so firmly that they all wanted to be and we were willing they should be in one part of the country, and all the manufacturers of steel and iron were located in another State, and so on all around. Would you, Mr. President, have a republic of a combination of separate elements in that way that could legislate to the just interests of them all? It is obvious that you could not; it would be totally impossible. The only way in which you can separate people under any circumstances that I know of, and have a republican government go on properly, is to separate them according to the individual inclination and wish of each man. Let him cast his lot among citizens under equal laws giving equal rights everywhere, not only to locations in the public lands, but every other right that belongs to the citizen in his character as such. In that way, and in that way only, in my judgment, can you have that homogeneous unity which is made up, it is true, of individual diversities in society, but which when looked at largely is a compact whole, not of one sect, not of one politics, not of one calling, not of one industry, but of every sect, every calling, every industry, every shade of political opinion, where being intermingled in that way they learn to respect the opinions of others, and harmonize their own with them, and to be, as we know in our own happy country it is generally, a compact and personally independent state of society where everything goes on smoothly.

My friend from Minnesota, I have no doubt, believes that this is a wise bill. I have no doubt that he believes this step, in derogation of what I believe to be the first principle of republican government, is so small a one, is so incidental, so merely, as he would call it, a drop in the bucket of political prosperity, that it is not worth while to make any fuss about it; but I feel that, with his philosophic and historical attainments and with his sound patriotism, he would say that if this were a precedent to be followed, to become general, so that we were bound by this precedent to give to others of any sect of religion, of any calling in life, of any character of politics, a separate right to compact themselves as an exclusive community in a Territory or on the public lands in a State—he would say at once, "No; it is fundamentally wrong that there should be allowed by law the right of any sect or body of people to separate themselves from the rest of the community and to have the exclusive privilege to build up within the State and within the Union a state of society which excludes in effect, and excludes by law so far as the right of the citizen to settle there goes, every other citizen of the Republic from intermingling in their society." It is too much like the Indian reservations, which are exceptional, however, for the reason that they are savages and are not capable, as is supposed, of immediate civilization. But if we were to civilize the Indians, if we were to set up, as has been proposed, an Indian territorial government in one part of the country, who would think of declaring that the Indians alone should have the exclusive right of populating and cultivating and developing the territory which should be assigned to them; and that they should continue to grow on and spread in the Republic as a separate people by themselves, at the same time taking part in the government which is to operate upon every citizen, East, West, North, and South alike?

No, Mr. President; in my judgment it is a fatal step, a fatal step to the prosperity of any republic that is founded upon the theory that ours is, to take this first instance of opening a vast body of public lands to the exclusive proprietorship of any sect of Christians, or of any political party, or of any people of a particular social standing, or of any race, or of any other condition except that broad and open one which holds out the lands of the Government to every citizen alike upon his making the entry, conforming to the law, and paying the price. In that way you build up States and republics in the unsettled parts of the Union that when built up contain all the elements not only of true social progress and true brotherhood with their neighbors, but also all the elements that will make forever more, if they are lived up to, a stable and prosperous republic. Otherwise you cannot do it.

However tempting, therefore, Mr. President, this opportunity to get fifty thousand workers and wheat-raisers and wool-growers, who may reside in Russia now, to come to this country, however great the bargain may be in the amount of products they would raise for us and sell—although I do not greatly see the force of that—yet I say we should not be tempted by any temporary or pecuniary advantage to depart from what I believe to be, as I have said, a fundamental principle in the progress and in the security of our republican government. Let us have no exclusions; let us know no boundaries; let us be a nation and a people where every man everywhere stands on an equality with his fellow-man, where there are no boundaries like Chinese walls to separate one sect or one opinion of politics or one calling from another; but an equal citizenship and an equal freedom.

For these reasons, Mr. President, it appears to me that we ought not to pass this bill. It ought to be said also in connection with the bill itself that I cannot perceive that there is any limitation upon the quantity of land in the aggregate which is to be given to these people. There is no limitation or obligation in respect to their occupying and improving these lands after they are entered. For aught I can see, although I know it is not so intended, these people having entered these lands and become the proprietors of them, might hold them fifty years for speculation if they liked, to sell them out afterward. Of course that can be corrected if it be so; but I think that is the present condition of the bill. I may be mistaken——

Mr. WINDOM. On that point I think the Senator is mistaken, because the bill provides that they shall take them under the existing land laws of the United States, which would require them either to pay for them or take them as homesteads after five years' settlement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that perfectly well. The seventh section makes the provision that they may enter them. They do so, paying for them at a certain price named. Very well. Suppose I, forming a grand land company, should go into a Western State and buy ten million acres of land in one compact body, presuming now that the law would allow me to do it, and I, and my heirs, and my and their associates hold it in order to speculate; what is to become of the State where we should make such a location? Would not every citizen curse us, and justly? It would just stop the prosperity of the State. Now, if these people are to be authorized by this act to make the entry and pay for the lands at $1.25 an acre, or whatever the price may be, and are not then required within any reasonable time to occupy, settle upon, and improve the lands, but are authorized still to live in Russia and to hold these lands as an investment, then I say that is a wrong policy. But as I stated, I did not rise to consider the details of the bill, but only to enter my humble protest, as one Senator responsible for the security of this Republic, against the principle upon which the bill is founded.

Mr. CLAYTON. If I understand the provisions of this bill, it provides for setting aside an amount of public lands equal to five hundred thousand acres; I believe that is the extreme limit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see any limit.

Mr. CLAYTON. The worst feature of the bill, according to my opinion, is that I see no assurance that these fifty thousand people who are allowed to settle in one compact body will ever become citizens of the United States. If I am correct in that, we open by this bill the way to the establishment of a vast colony of fifty thousand people who may owe allegiance as long as they occupy these lands to some foreign potentate. If that is so, it seems to me it would not be in harmony with the general principles of our Government. If I understand those general principles, our theory requires all the States in this Union to be acting under one particular form of government, republican, and harmonizing with each other. It seems to me it would be a very bad thing indeed to establish a colony so large as this of people who might owe allegiance to some other government than their own.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend from Arkansas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRATT. There is no such feature in the bill as the Senator supposes. These persons are to enter the lands in conformity with the existing laws of the United States. They must declare their intention to become citizens of the United States before they are allowed to enter a foot of the public lands.

Mr. CLAYTON. But I understand these lands are to be set aside for them, without their making their appearance even upon the territory of the United States.

Mr. WINDOM. Only for two years.

Mr. CLAYTON. Are they then to be under the provisions of the general homestead law and the pre-emption laws of the Government?

Mr. WINDOM. When they take possession of them they may enter them under the existing land laws of the United States. They may pre-empt them if the pre-emption law be in existence, or take them as homesteads after five years' settlement, or they may enter them and pay $1.25 an acre for them; but the reservation is only for two years, and unless they are taken within two years from the time of the notice they are subject to settlement by any other person.

Mr. CLAYTON. Do I understand from the Senator from Minnesota, then, that this bill is not subject to the criticism I have raised?

Mr. WINDOM. I think it is not.

Mr. CLAYTON The Senator thinks these persons must become citizens of the United States in order to enter and occupy these lands?

Mr. WINDOM. The bill provides that they "shall have the exclusive right of entry for the period of two years from the date of filing as aforesaid, under the laws of the United States existing at the date of entry;" and no one can enter or enjoy the benefit of the homestead and pre-emption laws, without becoming a citizen of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. If that is so, it seems to me that under our system of Government we ought not to depart from the general rule which we make applicable to all people. We have certain advantages here of our own. We are not selfish in those advantages. We are willing that persons from abroad may come here, and by becoming citizens of this country share with us in those advantages. That applies to Germans and to men of all other nationalities. It does not seem to me that we ought in this particular case to depart from that general rule. I am as glad as any one can be to see this country settled by immigrants who come here attracted by our peculiar institutions and our peculiar advantages; but I think it would be a bad precedent to establish to offer to these people before they come here advantages that are not offered to others. I may be mistaken; but from the hasty investigation I have given to this bill it appears to me to be subject to that objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have a very kindly feeling toward the object sought to be accomplished by this bill, and should be very glad to vote for it, and hope I may be able to do so; but I think it requires some amendment. I think it ought to be amended in some particulars. If I am right in my construction of the second section of the bill I think it ought to be amended. It says:

That upon presentation of the certificate aforesaid to the register of any land district, such agent as aforesaid shall be permitted to locate, in a compact body, any tract of unappropriated public land not mineral and not exceeding the amount of one hundred and sixty acres held at the minimum price, or eighty acres held at the double-minimum price, for each person composing such body of individuals named in the said petition and application.

That applies to males and females, to the youth and to the adult. Does the Senator from Minnesota mean so to include them?

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator will read the first section, I think he will find that his construction is wrong. The first section provides:

That whenever a body of such persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, shall, through a duly constituted and accredited agent, file with the Secretary of the Interior an application for permission to locate a portion of the public lands of the United States, accompanying such application with a list of the persons composing such body and the quantity desired by each.

As I understand it—and it was drawn at the Land Office with a view to conform to our land laws—the second section refers to the persons mentioned in the first.

Mr. CONKLING. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I ask the Senator from Minnesota if this body of individuals shall locate their lands and shall not become citizens of the United States, what is the provision of existing law which prevents their holding them without being naturalized?

Mr. WINDOM. They are to take them, as I have said once before, under the laws of the United States existing at the date of entry.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that.

Mr. WINDOM. And those laws require a declaration of intention to become citizens.

Mr. HAMLIN. It requires no more than a simple declaration.

Mr. WINDOM. We require of them precisely what we do of every other foreigner.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill allows them to set aside large quantities of territory and permits a large body of a particular sect to hold land with no provision that they shall at any time become citizens of the United States; is not that its effect?

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to an amendment that shall require them to become citizens before perfecting title, though I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. HAMLIN. I prefer that the Senator should amend his own bill. I call his attention to that defect, as I think it is, and I am sure it ought to be so guarded that they shall at some time be required to become citizens of the United States if you allow them to settle in a compact body and cover a large extent of country.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to make a single remark in answer to the impression which seems to have been made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and to have been followed somewhat by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] to the effect that we propose to introduce very large bodies of foreigners into some portions of our States in compact settlements, and that we propose to give them some special privileges, religious or political, and that the bill contemplates some sort of exemption from duties which are incumbent upon every American citizen. There is no such thing in the bill. In the first place its provisions are "that the aggregate of lands held under declaratory statements, as aforesaid, shall not, at any one time, exceed five hundred thousand acres, nor shall any one filing embrace more than one hundred thousand acres." That is the eighth section. The body of men provided for in the first section cannot file for more than one hundred thousand acres in any one place. I appeal to the Senate if that is a very dangerous body of men to introduce into this great Republic? One hundred thousand acres of land will accommodate sixty-two families, and that is all that can be taken in any one compact body. I do think that this nation is strong enough to resist successfully any evils that may be introduced into our community by the settlement of sixty-two families of Mennonites in our midst.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I wish to ask the Senator if there is anything in this bill after one body of men have selected five hundred thousand acres to prevent another body of men selecting another five hundred thousand acres as near the first as they can find the land? In other words, may not a dozen of these associations be formed in one county under the bill if the Secretary of the Interior chooses to allow it?

Mr. WINDOM. There never can be more than five hundred thousand acres at any one time in the whole country.

The aggregate of lands held under declaratory statements as aforesaid shall not at any one time exceed five hundred thousand acres.

Mr. CARPENTER. Would not that be to one body of men?

Mr. WINDOM. No; the declaratory statement of one body of men cannot exceed one hundred thousand, the aggregate five hundred thousand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At any one time.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to say to the Senator that the whole body of these people, as we understood their numbers, will occupy eventually about five million acres of public lands, but at no one time can more than five hundred thousand acres be held, and if the whole five hundred thousand shall be applied for and all the families that can occupy it shall come and settle upon it, there will be three hundred and ten families who have no special privileges, no exemptions from military duty, or any other exemptions from the duties of an American citizen.

I cannot conceive that there is any danger in this. There is absolutely nothing in this bill except authority for these people to come and make selections of land in order to enable them to send over their sons or members of their families before the main body comes, in order to take possession of those lands, build houses upon their quarter-sections, and prepare for the bulk of the body when they can get rid of their lands at home and be able to come here and take possession. When they come they are under all the laws that govern American citizens, and subject to every duty, as I have two or three times said, that belongs to an American citizen.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I rise to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. I ask him whether a foreigner who has only declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, in case of our country being engaged in war, can be drafted into the military service of the United States; whether he is not still, notwithstanding such declaration of intention, a subject of the foreign power, and entitled to call for its protection if we endeavor to make him the subject of a draft?

Mr. WINDOM. I must say to the Senator from Connecticut that I am unable to answer that question. Perhaps some other Senator can answer it.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. My own opinion is that a foreigner in that condition is not the subject of draft; that he is still entitled to the protection of the power from whose country he has emigrated to this country.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me, I think I can answer his question in this way: These people will owe allegiance to no country. They have been directed by the Emperor of Russia to leave his country in a certain number of years unless they think proper to remain there and give up their own nationality. If they become Russianized, learn the Russian language, adopt the Russian Church, they can remain there and occupy their property.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, the real point in this bill has not been touched. The Mennonites' difficulty with the Russian government consists simply in this: They, in their religious tenets, are opposed to war, and refuse to enter the military service of a great military power. They desire to emigrate somewhere where they will be free from the obligation of defending by physical force the nationality of which they are members, and this bill is so drawn that the Mennonites who come to this country under it may take up these lands and hold them indefinitely, without ever becoming citizens of the United States, and therefore without ever becoming liable to compulsory military service if the Government of the United States should be compelled to call upon them in time of war, as I understand the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question there? Is it not true that one of the stipulations made by Catherine with these Germans originally, was an exemption from military duty, so that they have, without regard to their religious tenets, a much more substantial objection than the one the Senator has assigned to complying with the military requisitions of Russia?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. The information which I have on the subject is simply derived from the public press and from encyclopedical statements regarding the Mennonites; and that information has led me to believe, and has been to the effect, that at the present time the Russian government demands of them military service.

Mr. CONKLING. So I understand.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. And on account of that demand they desire to leave the Russian territory and find a country where they will not be required to perform military service.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator's information is exactly like mine as far as he has gone; but my information, taking the narration up at that point, is that they ground their refusal to perform military service for Russia upon the allegation that one of the stipulations precedent upon which they left their own countries and settled upon the shores of the Black Sea was exemption from military service along with a stipulation that they would never part with their lands except to each other or their successors.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Very likely the stipulation may have been in the original arrangement by which they immigrated to the shores of the Black Sea; but the fact to-day remains that they desire to leave Russian territory because the Russian government calls upon them to perform military service.

When this matter first came before the Senate I objected to the mode in which it was then sought to be disposed of because of this information which had reached me, and I am of opinion that we never ought to establish the precedent of admitting colonies from abroad within our territory with a direct or indirect provision in the law admitting them by which they should be exempted from the defense of our common country. And as this bill is so drawn that they may take up these lands, may hold them and own them, and still remain in law the subjects of a foreign power and not liable to be drawn into the military service of the United States in time of war, I cannot vote for this bill until in that respect it be amended; and if it is amended in that respect, and if the Senator from Minnesota inserts a provision in it that before their title to these lands shall become perfect they shall become naturalized citizens of the United States, no Mennonite will come to our shores.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to do something for these Mennonites, and I think it may be done in a much less objectionable form than the amendment reported by the committee. The first section is very well, to have a small quantity of land withdrawn for the purpose of allowing them or almost any other settlers to locate upon it for a limited period of time; but the second, third, and fourth sections, and most of the fifth section, and the sixth section, and a part of the seventh and eighth sections are unnecessary, with a little proviso that I propose to add. I propose to substitute for the whole amendment, and I call the attention of the friends of the bill to my proposition and I think they will see that this covers all they desire, what I will read:

That whenever a body of such persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, shall, through a duly constituted and accredited agent, file with the Secretary of the Interior an application for permission to locate a portion of the public lands of the United States, accompanying such application with a list of the person or persons composing such body, and the quantity desired by each, the Secretary may authorize such location to be made in any land district of the United States, by giving such agent the proper certificate in writing, under seal of his office, stating that such application has been filed, and reciting the number of persons so applying and the number of acres which they may include in their claim.

I would strike out the rest of the first section and all down to the fifth section and go on—

That any person named in the application and petition on file with the Secretary of the Interior shall have the exclusive right of entry for the period of two years from the date of filing, as aforesaid, on complying with the laws of the United States existing at the date of entry.

I would strike out the rest of that section and the sixth section, and then go to the seventh:

That at the expiration of the period of two years, as aforesaid, all lands not entered by the parties entitled under the foregoing provisions shall be subject to the entry of any other person under the laws applicable to the same as other public lands of the United States.

Then the eighth section:

That no one filing shall embrace more than one township of thirty-six sections.

Thirty-six sections would be one hundred and forty-four quarter-sections; that would provide for one hundred and forty-four families in a township of six miles square.

Nor shall a new filing be made until the lands of the former filing shall be exhausted. And the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall have the power to make all needful rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

That would reduce the bill to this proposition: if a community of these people desired to come here, an agent might precede them and select a township of land, which would make room for one hundred and forty-four families, and that would be held for them for the period of two years, during which they might come and apply. That would be a sufficiently large community; and when they got that township they could take another, and so on. I see no harm in their taking as many townships as they could occupy in that way. I would not let them take another township until they had settled one township. I believe that would relieve the bill of a great many of its objectionable features. Of course to get the land they have to enter as in other cases. The only effect would be to enable an agent to come before them and have a township of land set apart. When they settled up that township they might take another, and so on.

Then I would allow any men, whether Mennonites, Irish, Germans, or others, if they had a number of settlers sufficient to fill a township, to name their people and have a year to settle the township. I do not think that would be a hardship.

There is no use in making a limit of five hundred thousand acres, because if they should want more than five hundred thousand acres to settle on in that way, I would not object. If they only have a township together, they will not be so exclusive but that they will have the influences of the American people around them.

Mr. CAMERON. I think, Mr. President, if Senators knew these people as I do, in place of making objections to their coming here, they would give them all the facilities they could possibly desire. We have a very large number of these people in Pennsylvania. They are among the best of our citizens. They are nearly all farmers. Their farms are the most highly cultivated of all our lands in Pennsylvania, and I think our lands are as well cultivated as any that I have seen in any part of the world. These people came to Pennsylvania about 1724 or 1725, and the proprietor, one of the Penns, authorized them to select lands just where they pleased, in any quantities they thought proper, and he charged them one shilling an acre and no more. They have increased and multiplied. They went to Lancaster County first, and now a number of them are in almost every county of the State, especially where there is good land. They have a fancy for the limestone valleys, and wherever there is a fine limestone country, there have the descendants of the early Mennonites gone. They are among our best citizens. They never interfere with anybody; they pay their debts; and they take care of their own poor. In time of war, whenever they are called upon, they pay such taxes as the Government asks of them; they go into the hospitals and become nurses; and during the rebellion a great many of the young people went out and bore arms for the country. Not one refused to send a substitute, or if the Government preferred taking a thousand dollars to getting a substitute, frequently they paid a thousand dollars for that purpose. They made no complaint; they were all loyal and faithful to the Government. So entirely are they believed to be honest that they can borrow money anywhere without any security. They are a thrifty, laborious, saving people. Now they are cultivating a school system. There is not a township in the counties in which they reside but has got a large number of school-houses of the best kind, with all the advantages which science has furnished to those who now build school-houses. They are hospitable. You cannot go to their houses without receiving a portion of what they have, and they never charge anybody for the entertainment which they furnish. I do not believe there is a better class of people in the world than are the German Mennonites.

In the early settlement of our country the settlements were made everywhere by colonies. In the lower part of Northampton County, Pennsylvania, the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians settled; in Chester County the Quakers went; and in Lancaster County the Mennonites. On the other side of the Susquehanna River the whole country was settled by Scotch and Irish. Everywhere the early settlers came in colonies, and everywhere they were well received. It is natural that these Mennonites should desire to come with their own people. They do not care about any particular form of this law. What they want principally is that they may have two years to select their lands in, and they desire that because the gentlemen who have come here desire to go home and tell their people what they have seen, to relate to them the advantages of our country, and induce them to leave the location where they are.

The Emperor of Russia, as it is said, regrets very much that he is compelled to part with them. He does so because his nobles are not willing that any set of people should be in the country who are not willing to become Russianized. They desire them to adopt the Russian tongue and become members of the Greek Church. I do not think, if the Emperor Alexander were at liberty to use his own individual judgment, he would permit them to go at all. He would certainly find great advantage in keeping them where they are settled now. There are seven or eight colonies in the neighborhood of the Black Sea, or perhaps nearer to the Sea of Azof. They cultivate, some of them, wheat; many of them are herdsmen; some are shepherds; and all of them thrifty and prosperous. About forty thousand now are willing to come. The number there is much larger than that. They do not intend all to settle in the same place. A large number of them have already purchased land, or made arrangements for purchasing land, in Minnesota, some in Dakota, and others desire to go to Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and the Indian country. I am sure that wherever they go they will be a blessing to the neighborhoods in which they think proper to settle.

Mr. STEWART. I will offer my amendment now as a substitute for the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "that," in the first line of the reported amendment, and to insert the following:

That whenever a body of such persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, shall, through a duly constituted and accredited agent, file with the Secretary of the Interior an application for permission to locate a portion of the public lands of the United States, accompanying such application with a list of the persons composing such body and the quantity desired by each, the Secretary may authorize such location to be made in any land district of the United States, by giving such agent the proper certificate in writing, under seal of his office, stating that such application has been filed, and reciting the number of persons so applying and the number of acres which they may include in their claim.

SEC. 2. That any person named in the application and petition on file with the Secretary of the Interior shall have the exclusive right of entry for the period of two years from the date of filing, as aforesaid, on complying with the laws of the United States at the date of entry.

SEC. 3. That at the expiration of the period of two years, as aforesaid, all lands not entered by the parties entitled under the foregoing provisions shall be subject to the entry of any other person under the laws applicable to the same as other public lands of the United States.

SEC. 4. That no one filing shall embrace more than one township of thirty-six sections; nor shall a new filing be made until the lands of the former filing shall be exhausted.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have not examined the details of this bill for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is anything in it in conflict with our general public policy relating to the public lands; but I deem it due to the class of persons intended to be benefited by its passage to add my concurrence in what my colleague has said as to their general character.

Under the various names of Mennonites, Tunkers, and "Ahmische," there are many of them living in that portion of Pennsylvania in which I reside; and I can with truth say that for thrift, industry, economy, integrity, and good morals, they are not exceeded by any other class of the population in that or any other State of this Union. They are not either, as is sometimes asserted, a laggard people in substantial improvement, for within recent years many of them have exhibited a spirit of enterprise and a desire for the intellectual advancement of their people as great as that of almost any other religious denomination. I have in my mind's eye now two representative men among the Mennonites in Pennsylvania, whom I do not deem it any impropriety to name, one of them Shem Zook, of Mifflin County, a man of very considerable literary culture, who has written a history of that branch of the denomination to which he belongs; another, Isaac Kaufman, of Somerset County, a man of great wealth, who has given his time, his influence, and his money to the advancement of the building of railroads and other public improvements in the portion of the State in which he lives. There are many such men among them. They are encouraging newspapers, and establishing institutions of learning.

If there be any class of people, Mr. President, whom we should encourage to come to our shores by any legislation in consonance with our general policy in reference to the public lands, it cannot be extended in any direction with more advantage to our public interests than by encouraging the Mennonites to settle among us, and a properly guarded bill for that purpose shall have my cordial support.

Mr. CARPENTER. The morning hour having expired, and it being evident that this bill cannot be passed without further debate, I move to postpone its further consideration, and that the Senate proceed to thec onsideration of the bill providing for an election in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. STEWART. Before that is done, I should like to have an order made to print the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print will be made.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope we shall act upon this bill to-day. We are as well prepared to vote now as we ever shall be. Let a decision one way or the other be made. It seems to me the Louisiana case, having waited for four months, can wait for an hour longer.

Mr. CARPENTER. In reply to the suggestion of my friend from Minnesota, I will say to him that I think, strictly speaking, his bill fell with the morning hour, but it has gone twenty minutes over the morning hour without interruption. I gave notice yesterday that I should make this motion to-day. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor upon the Louisiana bill, and I understand is prepared to address the Senate, and I hope the Senate will take up the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I am willing to submit the question of taking it up to a vote of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish just to say a word more. The gentlemen who are agents for these people are here now. They desire to go home soon and make preparations for bringing out some of their people this year. I saw their bishop the other day, Mr. Johnson, a remarkably intelligent man. He desired above all things that we should act promptly upon the matter, for he wanted to give notice to some of their people who think of going to Manitoba. I think we can dispose of it in a very few minutes. I am sure they do not care about the machinery of the bill; they will take almost any sort of a bill which allows them two years' time to close out their present land; that is all they care about. I do not wish to say anything more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the pending and all prior orders be postponed to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin?

The question being put, a division was called for, which resulted—ayes 31, noes 12.

Mr. WINDOM. I give notice that I will try to call up this bill again to-morrow morning, if it goes over now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the yeas and nays. I do not wish to prevent any Senator making a speech on the Louisiana case if he desires to do so. If the simple object is to take up the bill to enable Senators to speak upon it, I have no objection; but if the desire is to take up this bill for final action, I should like to have a vote by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to ask to have it taken up to enable the Senator from New Jersey to address the Senate upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is entirely within the control of the Senate to lay it on the table at any moment.

Mr. CARPENTER. As far as I have any will about the matter, it is to proceed with this bill as any other business bill until it be disposed of in a proper way. If Senators choose to refer it to a committee, so be it; if they choose to vote for it without reference, let that be so; but I want it distinctly understood that I am not interjecting this bill here as a mere foot-ball in the Senate, as a mere opportunity for debate as in a lyceum. This bill is business, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays and let the debate go on, giving notice that at the proper time I will move to lay it on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn, and the Louisiana bill is before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota;

A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 2425) to provide for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of newspapers by mail within the county where published;

A bill (H. R. No. 2899) revising and embodying all the laws authorizing post-roads in force on the 1st day of December, 1873; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2979) abolishing the office of appraiser of imported merchandise, appointed under the act of July 14, 1870, and acts amendatory thereof, at certain places.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 42) granting a pension to Caleb A. Lamb, late a musician in Company E, Forty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; and

An act (S. No. 449) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy A. Hough.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, having rather incidentally than by deliberate purpose taken some subordinate part in the discussion of this question when it was before the Senate on a former occasion, I propose now to submit concisely my views on two propositions: First, that the President of the United States was authorized by the Constitution, standing alone, and that he was also authorized by the statutes of the country, to send armed protection to Louisiana; and second, that Congress is not authorized to order a new election in that State.

And I may here say that while I cannot agree with the conclusions of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] I trust I do not violate delicacy in stating that I admire the marked ability with which he has presented his views. He has so presented the case that he may properly demand and not petition for it a serious and careful consideration. It is to the labors of that Senator and of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that we and the country are indebted for an understanding of this somewhat complicated subject.

I submit that the President was authorized by the Constitution, standing alone and not enforced by any statute, to send the protection he did to Louisiana. Mr. Kellogg was the governor de facto of that State. The President told us that he had so recognized him, and that he would continue so to do unless Congress directed to the contrary, and we purposely did nothing. Kellogg was therefore governor de facto, recognized by the President and by the silent acquiescence of Congress; and on the 13th of May, 1873, he sent the President this communication:

SIR: Domestic violence existing in several parishes of this State which the State authorities are unable to suppress without great expense and danger of bloodshed, and the Legislature not being in session, and it being impossible to convene the Legislature in time to meet the emergency, I respectfully make application, under the fourth section of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, for a sufficient military force of the United States Government to enable the State authorities to suppress insurrection and domestic violence.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM P. KELLOGG,
Governor of Louisiana.

To his Excellency U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States.

If the President was satisfied that domestic violence existed, on being called upon by the governor for a force to suppress it he was bound under the provisions of the Constitution to do so whether there was or was not any statute imposing that duty upon him. That disorder existed in that State cannot be questioned, because the preamble of the bill introduced for a new election truly declares in these words:

Whereas the public peace in said State is at present preserved and can only be preserved during the existing state of things in said State at the expense of the United States and by retaining a part of the army in said State.

That the demand upon the President was made according to the constitutional requirements (whether in compliance with the statutes or not) cannot be questioned, after reading the foregoing application.

Sir, the Constitution carefully distributes the powers of government into three branches, the legislative, judicial, and executive. Article 1, section 8, declares the powers of Congress in eighteen different clauses. Article 3, section 1, declares that the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may ordain and establish; and article 2, section 1, declares that the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States. This distribution of power is essential to republican liberty. The aggrandizement of all power in one body, whether it consists of many individuals or of a unit, is despotism. The question is, to which of these three divisions of government the duty under the Constitution attaches to protect a State from domestic violence? The Constitution says that it is "the United States" that is to give this protection. We are here told that saying the "United States" shall give the protection is equivalent to saying that Congress shall give it. To that I cannot agree. If the Constitution had intended that Congress, as contradistinguished from the executive or judiciary, should give this protection, it would have enumerated this power among those conferred upon Congress in the eighth section of the first article. In that enumeration of the powers of Congress it is provided that Congress may suppress insurrection and repel invasion; but a general insurrection is a very different thing from domestic violence in a State. That term includes insurrection, but it comprehends much more that does not amount to insurrection. Neither can it be claimed that this power is given to Congress by the last clause of the eighth section of the first article, which says Congress shall have power "to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers," because this protection against domestic violence is not a foregoing power, not being mentioned until we come to the fourth section of the sixth article, while this provision as to making all laws, &c., is found in the eighth section of the first article; and besides, where the question is whether the President's power is restricted to the execution of a statute, rather than to the execution of the Constitution, it does not settle anything to say that Congress may make laws when necessary and proper. That is the very question. When not necessary they need not, and when not proper they may not, pass the law. I say that Congress need not pass a law to give authority to the President to afford this protection; not that they may not.

The term "United States" includes all three of the divisions of the Government, and that division of the Government is to act to which the duty appropriately belongs. If a State should pass a law tending to create an aristocracy, as that a State judgeship should be hereditary, then it would be the province of the judiciary to fulfill the guarantee and to declare such law void. In that case the judicial power is "the United States." If all law and all form of government in a State has been destroyed by a rebellion, so that it is necessary to have a new organization of government, then it is the legislative power that must fulfill this guarantee by setting up new governments, and then Congress is the United States. And here is where Andrew Johnson violated his duty and departed from his proper and legitimate powers, by undertaking as the Executive to exercise legislative functions. If there exist domestic violence, disorder, and obstruction to the laws, then it is the province of the Executive on being called upon to fulfill the guarantee of the Constitution and the Executive is "the United States."

Mr. President, this provision of the Constitution contemplates a sudden emergency, when violence has subjected and trampled down the law, and when, without waiting for the Legislature, the governor is to call upon the President for protection. Every other year Congress is for nine months not in session, and when in session the introduction of a bill, its reference to a committee, its report upon it, its being three times read and thus passing each House, and then to be subjected to the approval of the President, is a process inconsistent with the demands of the emergency as contemplated by the Constitution. I know Congress may delegate some of its powers; but when the duty is such that Congress cannot perform and that the Executive must, and the power is omitted in enumeration of the powers of Congress, and the power is carefully stated to belong not to Congress but to the United States, then we are to infer that the Constitution intended to confer the power on the Executive, and not that the duty was to be performed either by the President, or by any one else, by virtue of a delegation of power from Congress.

Again, the President of the United States is by the Constitution invested with all the power necessary to perform this duty. He is, by article 2, section 2, made the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; and then the Constitution, having given him this power, expressly declares "that the President shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and requires him to swear "that he will faithfully execute the office of President." There has never been any act passed requiring him to perform this constitutional duty. The Constitution need not be enacted into law to be enforced. It is itself the highest law. There might or there might not be an act of Congress authorizing the President to repel invasion; that is merely accidental. His duty is the same. If a fleet should come up the Potomac, is the President to stand like a cowardly dotard, with the Army and Navy at his control, until the White House is in ashes and the Capitol in ruins, waiting for a declaration of war by Congress, or authority to act from them? The Constitution has made him the custodian of the nation, the protector of its laws; it has given him the means to execute his high office, and he must perform it.

We claimed that the Rio Grande was the western boundary of Texas. Mexico disputed it; and President Polk sent General Taylor there in 1845 to protect our interests, and war existed for months before it was declared by Congress.

We obtained possession of Louisiana in 1803; of Florida in 1819; and there were frequent occasions when the President sent our fleet to guard the disputed territory between the Mississippi River and the Perdido.

It is true that it is the laws of the United States, and not of the States, that the President, under the Constitution, is to see are faithfully executed; but under our system of government the laws of the United States and the laws of the States are in their execution so inseparably interwoven and interlaced that it is impossible that the former can be executed and enforced in a State where anarchy exists; and consequently, under the provision that the President is to see the laws of the United States faithfully executed, he must see to it that anarchy does not exist in the State.

I do not see that we have on this question anything to do with the propriety of Durell's decisions. The President is intrusted with the Army, not to enforce any man's views or opinions; he is intrusted with the duty of enforcing the laws; he enforces the writ which speaks in the name of the United States, and is tested by the Chief Justice and must be obeyed. To hold the President responsible for unjust decisions because he insists that the process of the United States shall be respected, would be to hold that he must sit in judgment to approve or disapprove the findings of the Federal courts, and would be a commingling of the executive with the judicial functions of greater absurdity, perhaps, than the merging of the powers of Congress with those of the Chief Magistrate as insisted on in this case.

I then submit, Mr. President, that protection from "domestic violence" under the fourth section of the fourth article appeals to the arm, the force, of the nation in an emergency, and is an appeal to the President, because the executive power is vested in him and it is executive power that is required; and because he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, he is bound to see the laws faithfully executed; and because it is the United States and not "Congress" that guarantees against "domestic violence." Congress cannot take that power from the President. It is his. Congress may regulate it, may say he shall or shall not use the militia, he shall or shall not use the Army or the Navy; it may take from him all means of performing his constitutional duty, but when he has the means he must perform it.

I do not dispute that Congress may also execute this guarantee. There is, under the Constitution, a mixture as well as a division of powers. The President acts legislatively when he approves or vetoes a bill; the Senate acts judicially in impeachments; the House of Representatives acts as an inquest in its presentation of an impeachment; and the Senate shares the executive power in the matter of appointments and treaties; but the President in his sphere is as independent of Congress as Congress is of him. He may nominate, and with the advice of the Senate appoint, to office; he may convene Congress, and under certain circumstances may adjourn it; he may receive public ministers; he may make treaties, subject to ratification by the Senate; he must see to it that the laws are executed, and he must fulfill the guarantees of the Constitution when that duty appropriately belongs to him.

These powers cannot be taken from him.

Congress has sometimes attempted to encroach upon these powers. It tried to limit the pardoning power, but the Supreme Court sustained the President. In the case known as Ex parte Garland, found in 4 Wallace, 380, the court says:

> Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon, nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders. The benign prerogative of mercy cannot be fettered by any legislative restriction.

And again in 13 Wallace, 128, in a case arising under what is known as Drake's amendment, the court hold a similar doctrine. The House of Representatives, in 1796, attempted to limit the President's power to make treaties, and by a resolution declared that where a treaty depended for the execution of any of its stipulations on an act of Congress, it was the right of the House to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect. The case in question was a treaty with Great Britain.

Washington, in a message of March 30, 1796, denies such power; and Kent (volume 1, page 286) says: "The House of Representatives is not above the law, and has no dispensing power. The argument in favor of the conclusive efficacy of every treaty made by the President and Senate is so clear and palpable as to carry conviction throughout the community." We must be careful, if we intend to preserve this government, how the legislative branch, which is by far the most powerful, encroaches on the executive or on the judiciary.

Governor Kellogg was right in making his application for aid to rest on the Constitution rather than upon any statute.

But I submit that it is perfectly clear that the President was by statute also authorized to afford this protection. The statute of 1795 authorizes the President to use the militia in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof on the application of the governor or Legislature.

The act of 1807 substitutes the Army for the militia, and goes further than the act of 1795, and authorizes the President to use the Army not only in cases of "insurrection," but in cases of "obstruction of the laws either of the United States or of any individual State." This certainly was a case of obstruction of the laws of an individual State. I have that confidence in the legal judgment of the Senator from Wisconsin, that I am induced to believe that he will agree with me that the statute of 1807 applies directly to this case. My friend interrupts me, and truly says that the statute of 1807 contains a provision that the President is to use the Army where the militia could be used.

Mr. CARPENTER. Under the then existing law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On the construction of the statute of 1807 we join issue; and as that issue is determined the President, so far as he acted under the statutes, was right or was wrong. My friend would strike out of the statute of 1807 the words "in case of obstruction of the laws of the United States or of any individual State." He would limit and nullify those words, because the act further says that he was to use the Army where it was lawful for him to call forth the militia to suppress an insurrection.

In construing a law we must, if we can, give effect to every part of it. I submit that those words, "where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia," do not in any way limit or restrict the power given to the President to prevent the obstruction of the laws of a State, but have an entirely different office. They mean this: The statute of 1795 had declared that the President might use the militia where he was called upon by the Legislature or the governor of a State to suppress an insurrection. The statute of 1807 provides that he may use the Army to suppress an insurrection or to prevent the obstruction to the laws of the United States or of any State where he could have used the militia, which is where he is called upon to prevent such obstruction to the laws by the Legislature or by the governor of a State. There is in the act of 1807 no provision excepting this reference back to the act of 1795 requiring the using of the Army to prevent an obstruction to the laws to depend on the President being called upon by the governor or Legislature for the aid of the Army. Let me read the two acts, and I do not see that there can be any difference between us as to their construction. The first act is in these words:

> In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof it shall be lawful for the President of the United States (on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

The act of 1807 is as follows:

> In all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to put a question at that point?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. We entirely agree that under the act of 1807 the President cannot use the Army or Navy except in cases where by the former law he could use the militia. I understand that to be the Senator's view.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not at all.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am speaking simply of the statute, not of the Constitution, now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not by the statute. I hold that under the act of 1807 the President may use the Army and Navy in a case of insurrection, and——

Mr. CARPENTER. Where he could not have used the militia before?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I understand the Senator, as I did before, to concede that under the act of 1807 the President is only authorized to use the Army and Navy in that class of cases where by the statute of 1795 he might have used the militia.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; we differ again. My position is that he can only use the Army and Navy where under the act of 1795 he could use the militia to suppress an insurrection, but under the act of 1807 he may use the Army and Navy in other cases than to suppress insurrection; he may use them where there is an obstruction to the laws of an individual State.

Mr. CARPENTER. I now understand the Senator's position. That was all I wanted to do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think it would be contrary to all rules of construction to hold that you are to strike out those words "in case of obstruction to the laws of the United States or any individual State," and give them no significance.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does not my friend do the same thing with the words "in cases where by law he is authorized to use the militia?" I take that to be a description of the case in which the President is authorized to use the Army and Navy. It must be a case where prior to the act of 1807 he could have used the militia. Then under the act of 1807 he may have used the Army and Navy instead of the militia. Then go back to the former law to see where he may use the militia in a State; and it must be a case of insurrection in a State against the government thereof.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, Mr. President; the significance of those words "where he could use the militia" is this: where he is called upon by the governor or the Legislature, as is provided in the act of 1795 in reference to the militia. It will be observed that there is in the act of 1807 no other provision requiring the use of the Army and Navy to depend upon the call to be made by the governor or Legislature. We thus give effect and force to every word of the act of 1807. By giving the construction to the statute of 1807 which my friend insists on, we strike out the words "in cases of obstruction to the laws of the United States or of any individual State," and also leave the act without any provision whatever making a call by the governor or the Legislature a necessary precedent to the use of the Army and Navy. The President was authorized by the Constitution standing alone, and was authorized by the statutes, to give the protection he did to Louisiana.

Now let me consider the second proposition, namely, that the United States is not authorized to order a new election in Louisiana. The Constitution provides that the United States shall guarantee to each State government peace, tranquillity, freedom from anarchy, and disorder; second, its guarantee is that each State shall have a government in form republican; that it shall not be in its frame-work an aristocracy, where authority is vested in a privileged order; that it shall not be a democracy, where the people in person exercise the sovereign power; the government shall not be a despotism, where the absolute power is exercised by a man or men without constitutional restraint; but that the government shall be in form republican, where the supreme power is intrusted to representatives elected by the people.

The Constitution says—and whether right or wrong we are controlled by it, and it is beyond all argument—that we are only to guarantee a republican form of government with order and tranquillity; and when we insist that full and accurate significance shall be given to the word "form" as it occurs in this provision of the Constitution we are not sticking in the bark, we are not superficial, but we are going to the very root of the matter. We are claiming that the Federal Government only has to do with the form, leaving the substance, the administration of the form of government, to the people of the States. Those who would ignore this word "form" from the restricted grant of power given by the States under the constitutional compact to the Federal Government would usurp the very substance to the Federal Government, and leave only the "form" or shell of republican government to the States.

The Senator from Wisconsin submitted this well-considered sentence to the Senate:

If I am right in saying that it is the vital element of republican government that its rulers are chosen by the people, it follows that the present government of Louisiana, lacking this, is not a republican government.

I do not object to his definition. Republican government is one the vital element of which is that rulers are elected by the people. Ten years ago a majority of the people of Louisiana had no voice in electing the rulers. Was it a republican government? I do not say that it was. It certainly was not, under the definition stated. But as Congress had no right except over the form of government, it was never claimed that under the guarantee clause of the Constitution Congress could give the right to vote to the disfranchised majority of the people of that State. It required an amendment to the Constitution before that could be effected.

This word "form" is not a matter of chance as it occurs in this Constitution. The people of the Southern States, when they entered into this compact, knowing that large portions of their populations were disfranchised, and not intending that they should have a voice in the election of rulers, would never have agreed to insert in the Constitution that the Federal Government should see to it that their State governments should not only be republican in form, but also should see to it that the rulers were elected by the people. They stipulated that all the people should be considered and counted in the apportionment of representation, but not so in the election of rulers. If we turn to the history of this word "form" in the Constitution we find that it was carefully selected. I read from volume 2 of the Madison Papers. On the 29th of May, 1787, this resolution was introduced by Edmund Randolph as part of the plan for the Constitution, page 734:

Resolved, That a republican government—

Using the words the Senator from Wisconsin insists on—ought to be guaranteed by the United States to each State.

That resolution came up again on the 18th of July, when this change took place, (page 1139:)

Resolved, That a republican constitution—

A very different thing; now it is being changed to a matter of governmental frame-work—

Resolved, That a republican constitution ought to be guaranteed to each State by the United States.

On the same day Mr. Randolph (on page 1140) caught the idea and changed his proposition in this wise:

Resolved, That no State be at liberty to form any other than a republican government.

This is a guarantee against despotism, against aristocracy, against democracy. That was considered awhile, and eventually Mr. Wilson moved that which was finally adopted, no one dissenting:

Resolved, That a republican form of government shall be guaranteed to each State

It is the very substance of republican government that we give them order, tranquillity, peace, government; and we see to it that it is republican in form, and that we leave it to them to regulate their own affairs.

My friend may ask whether I am content that the people of Louisiana shall be the victims of fraud, and that their rulers shall be elected by chicanery. No, Mr. President; I am not content. I am not content that republican government does not exist in Turkey or in Russia; but we have no power to give those nations republican governments. We have more power, it is true, over the States than we have over those kingdoms, but we have no more power over the States than is granted to us in the Constitution, which is to give them government, and that republican in form. We regret to see men waste their estates and destroy their health in dissipation; but the value of individual freedom prevents such legislative restraints as might prevent the evils. Better have individual freedom with the evils than destroy it by chafing restraints. So better let the State election be free with the evils than impose restraints and supervisions that impair the freedom of the State.

Mr. CARPENTER. I want not to answer the Senator, but simply to ask him a question, as he did me the other day, so that I may distinctly understand him. Does he maintain that in case the three branches of government in Louisiana to-day, that is the men holding those three branches of government, shall collude together, the court to decide all questions in favor of the other two, the other departments to administer everything in their common interest, to keep themselves in power under the present existing republican constitution of that State during their natural lives, and they should do so for fifteen years, would Congress have any power to interfere, the form—that is the constitution—being conceded to be republican?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is not a case before us.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is two years before us.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think I will show the case supposed is not before us at any time. It is difficult to solve questions put in this manner out of the order of debate; but my answer is: That if after repeated trials in a State, where we have performed our duty of giving them order and government, and of seeing to it that it is republican in form, it should turn out that the people were so depraved, ignorant, and degraded, so unfit for the blessings of republican government, that they abused all their privileges, I suppose it would then be incumbent upon us to fulfill that guarantee of the Constitution pro tanto, to fulfill it just as far as we could, and to give them government, even if it was under a military commission. But, sir, we will never be called upon to resort to that extreme measure, unless the extreme case which my friend has supposed, of the executive, legislative, judicial branches of government, and the people themselves, all combining in one dire conspiracy to destroy themselves.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let me correct my friend as to the effect of my question. My question meant this: Where the judges of the supreme court, the members of the Legislature and the executive department, the governor and the other officers, should combine among themselves to hold the people under their government, and the people should be of course resisting that, and the government should apply to the President to sustain it, and the President should interfere, and then the question should be presented to us whether, after that thing had continued for ten years, and they had avowed their purpose of continuing for life, we should have any power whatever to interfere? The particular case is only put to test the Senator's argument of the distinction between our guaranteeing a republican government and what he calls a republican form of government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think I have answered that question. I say that we are bound to carry out the guarantee of the Constitution. If the people are so entirely unfit for a republican government, we must still give them government, even if it is a military commission. But no such state of things will exist. You can suppose a condition of things which will prove that any government is inefficient and unfit for the purposes for which it is inaugurated.

Mr. President, if the Federal Government can, in the exercise of its arbitrary discretion—a discretion from which there is no appeal, and to which there is no review, not even by the people, for we are not responsible to the people of Louisiana for the votes given here—if the Federal Government can, in the exercise of this arbitrary power, set aside the election of governors and Legislatures of the States, then there is an end of the independent government of the States. I submit that the procedure here contemplated is without precedent in the General Government, and without analogy in any of the State governments.

As a matter of necessity, deliberative assemblies must be the judges of the qualifications of their own members. We judge of the qualifications of Senators, and the House of those of Representatives. But further than this necessity extends was it ever heard of that an election of a State officer, a governor, a State treasurer, a comptroller, was set aside by a political body? An election is never set aside even by the judiciary. It is submitted to a dispassionate and impartial tribunal of justice, not to set aside an election, but to determine whether the claimant was ever elected.

Order a new election in Louisiana, and you have established a precedent that must impair elective government. Excited parties enter upon a strongly contested election; the one party is in harmony with the dominant party in Congress, (perhaps a Senator is to be elected by the Legislature;) that party seeks by violence and fraud to obtain success, and when it fails comes to Congress and makes that very fraud and violence the pretense for covering their defeat and for having the election set aside, and for having a second trial with the adverse party who were successful damaged and disgraced by having their victory set aside. No, sir; better far let the States suffer for their own misdeeds, even the innocent with the guilty; their suffering will lead them to cure the evil. Admonished by the evil results of a vicious election, in the calm periods that intervene between elections all parties will unite in devising and adopting safeguards to secure honest elections. Registry laws, poll-lists, proper places for the polls, police regulations, and severely penal statutes will be adopted as the means of preventing the repetition of the evil. We had better adhere to the Constitution and do what it says, which is that we shall guarantee to the several States government; which we did with Louisiana when we sent our troops there preserving order and tranquillity; and that we shall guarantee to them a republican form of government; which we did when we approved the constitution of Louisiana under which form that government is now carried on.

If there are frauds in elections or usurpations in office, let the remedy be found in the courts of the States or by means of impeachment, or by the frequently recurring popular elections. But let us adopt the theory that we are under the guarantee clause of the Constitution to interfere with States further than to secure to them order and tranquillity and a republican form of government, and that we are to see to it that the proper persons are in power, still I insist that Congress is not to order a new election in Louisiana. If Congress is to interfere, and there is one whom we know has been duly elected, and who under the constitution of Louisiana is entitled to the office of governor, Congress surely is not to interfere by ordering a new election, but by placing the one entitled to the office by election and by the Louisiana constitution in power.

This election contest between Kellogg and McEnery was on November 4, 1872. On that day Warmoth was unquestionably the duly elected governor of Louisiana. We are called upon to order an election because no one has since been declared duly elected. But that is just the case which the constitution of Louisiana, as approved by us, provides for when in the fifteenth article, on the twenty-second page of this case, it says that the—

Governor shall continue in office until the Monday next succeeding the day his successor shall be declared duly elected.

If any one has in the sense of the Louisiana constitution been duly declared elected since the 4th of November, 1872, there is no pretense for our ordering a new election. If no one has been so duly declared elected, then Warmoth is governor until the Monday after such declaration, and our business is to reinstate Warmoth and not to order a new election. Can it be insisted that when the constitution provides that one elected by the people shall continue in office until a successor is elected we may interfere and deprive him of his office? If we interfere, it must be to place him in power.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me at that point a question? Taking that view of the case, suppose Governor Warmoth had continued to break up every election from 1872 on, and had been there four or five years as governor under that provision, would not Congress then have a right to interfere and order an election for the purpose of establishing a republican government in that State?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not see that what Warmoth might have done or might not have done alters the constitution of Louisiana. By that we are to be regulated and not by the vagaries of Mr. Warmoth. That constitution declares that Warmoth shall be governor until the Monday next after his successor is duly declared elected. Do not understand me to be in favor of reinstating Warmoth. I am not. I use the argument to show that we had better live up to the Constitution of the United States, guarantee to each State order and a republican form of government, and let the States determine for themselves whether they will have a Warmoth or a McEnery or a Kellogg as governor.

But again, Mr. President, if Congress should not reinstate Warmoth, still it should not order a new election; for the author of the bill we are considering tells us that McEnery had a majority of 9,606 votes over Kellogg. The returns themselves have been brought by subpœna from Louisiana and were before the committee; and the Senator from Wisconsin says that—

Ray McMillen and Pinchback were before the committee conducting their respective sides of the case, and they all agreed that those were the returns, and agreed that those returns showed the result that had been arrived at by the De Feriet board that McEnery had 9,606 majority. There was no contest about it.

Some question in debate was made about there being forgeries in these returns, and the Senator from Wisconsin adds a note to his very able speech showing that that does not change the result. I may show what those returns are presently. They are paper; if true, valuable; if false, worthless; but I am looking at the case from my friend's stand-point. If we are to interfere it should be to install McEnery, not to destroy his election, for it is certainly as essential to a republican government that one elected to office should fill the office as that one not elected should not fill it. But the Senator from Wisconsin does not favor installing McEnery for this reason: He says "although of the ballots actually cast McEnery had a majority, yet in consequence of the frauds committed previous to the election that result utterly reverses what was the wish and intention of that people." That is no reason why McEnery should not be installed. If he had 9,606 majority of the votes cast he was prima facie governor, entitled to his seat, subject to being subsequently removed by judicial proceedings.

Mr. CARPENTER. Notwithstanding he obtained them by fraud?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Notwithstanding he obtained them by fraud.

Mr. CARPENTER. I cannot see now where would be the republican government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In the State of Wisconsin Barstow was elected governor. (I refer to the case of Bashford vs. Barstow, fourth Wisconsin Reports, page 398.) He was not the true governor, he was not fairly elected, but he was inaugurated, sent his message to the Legislature, and acted as governor I think some sixty days, when an information was filed in the court of Wisconsin averring that Barstow was not elected but that Bashford was, and the result was that Barstow was ousted and Bashford inaugurated; and although, as I have understood, the incumbent had stacked the State-house with arms, the noiseless, silent power of the law ousted him and placed the true governor in power. So it would be no novelty that McEnery with his 9,606 majority should be placed in office and afterward removed therefrom when the fraud should be proven. Do not let me be understood as favoring the idea that McEnery should be made governor, for I do not. I insist that it would be more logical than to order a new election. I make the suggestion to show that we better stand by the Constitution of the country, and secure to every State order and a government republican in form.

But, Mr. President, again, it is not only more logical to install Warmoth or McEnery than to order a new election, but it is more logical to leave Kellogg in power than to order a new election. Kellogg since 1872 has in fact been governor of Louisiana, and is now. Laws have been enacted with his approval, contracts have been made, rights have vested, the people of Louisiana have order, and government republican in form. That is not all. He is governor in accordance with the will of the people of Louisiana if the conclusions of the Senator from Wisconsin are correct, and he has given this subject much attention. In his recent speech he says:

So I believe, from this testimony and from the whole history of the case, that although of the ballots actually cast McEnery had a majority, yet in consequence of the frauds committed previous to the election, that result utterly reverses what was the wish and intention of that people.

* * * * * * * * *

My belief is, that if any judicial court to-day had jurisdiction of the question in Louisiana, the result of that election, as held, that is to say the result of the ballots actually cast, would be shown to be that McEnery was elected; but I am equally well persuaded that the result misrepresents the will and the intention of the people of that State on that election day, and that it was in consequence of these frauds and obstacles in the way of registration, and the fraudulent location of voting places, that Warmoth was able to carry that State by from six to nine thousand majority in favor of McEnery.

And in his speech of the 4th of March:

I do not think that McEnery was in fact elected, although the returns show that he was.

Mr. President, shall Congress in its interference disregard the claims of Warmoth under the constitution of Louisiana, disregard the claims of McEnery, who had nine or ten thousand majority, and turn out of office one who is now quietly discharging the duties there and has been since 1872, when we are told by the very mover of this measure that he is governor in accordance with the wish and intention of that people? I cannot come to that conclusion.

The Senator from Wisconsin, in speaking of the election in New York in 1868, says:

Griswold was elected, but Hoffman was canvassed in as governor of that State.

And he says that we should not interfere in that case, "not because Congress did not possess the power, but because such a case would not justify the exercise of it. Indeed each case must be judged of by its own circumstances and surroundings; and while Congress ought not to exercise this power on slight occasions, or to correct mere irregularity not productive of important consequences, yet in a case like this it would seem that if Congress possessed the power it ought to be exercised."

And in this case one of the circumstances to be considered is that Kellogg is and since 1872 has been exercising the duties of his office; that he is in office in accordance with the wish and intention of the people, to use the language of the Senator. It is strange that my friend should conclude that the Federal Government should not interfere in a case like that of Hoffman when, according to his hypothesis, "Griswold was elected and Hoffman canvassed into office," and interfere in Kellogg's case. We ought not to interfere when one is in office against the will of the people, but we should interfere where the incumbent, he assures us, is in office in accordance with the wish and intention of the people. Is not the case of Hoffman much stronger than that of Kellogg; Hoffman misrepresenting and Kellogg representing the will of the people? If we were to adopt my friend's new theory in either case, we should have commenced in the case of New York and not in that of Louisiana.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. The vast difference between the two cases cannot fail to strike the Senator. In New York the governor alone was questioned, the Legislature was not questioned. The governor was not the law-making power. In Louisiana the whole law-making power of the State was in the same condition, and that bogus government may pass laws, may levy taxes, may repudiate the State debt; and all those things may be done by men not elected. In New York they could not do it. That is the difference in the magnitude of the two cases. I do not say there is any difference in the power, but as to the expediency of exercising it in one case, the evils to be feared from it are totally different from what they are in the other.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend cannot have failed to observe that I have said nothing about the Legislature of Louisiana. For all that I have said, he does not know but that I am in favor of his bill, so far as the Legislature is concerned. I have only treated of the governor's election, and his remarks referring to the Legislature of Louisiana are entirely foreign to the subject we are discussing.

Mr. CARPENTER. If that be so, there can be no difference in the case where one man holds a seat in a Legislature without an election, and a case where the whole Legislature hold without election.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If there is no difference between a governor and one member of the Legislature, the remark is pertinent; but inasmuch as the governor is but one branch of government, it is not pertinent.

Mr. CARPENTER. He is not the whole law-making power.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; he is not.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator, if he will permit me, that if Kellogg does represent the majority of the people of Louisiana, as seems to be conceded, it is equally certain that the Legislature represents the majority of the people of Louisiana.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And the singularity further about my friend's plan is that he would turn Kellogg out, although he represents the wish and intention of the people, because he has not a majority of the votes, but would not turn McEnery in, who has 10,000 majority; so that it seems this 10,000 majority is good as against Kellogg, but worthless in favor of McEnery.

But, Mr. President, passing by the question as to the constitutional power of Congress to do more than to preserve order and to secure a republican form of government, passing by the question of Warmoth, McEnery, and Kellogg, let us see whether a case is made in which we should order a new election.

The first thing to be established is that no one was elected governor, for if any one was, our duty, if we interfere in any way, clearly is to install the person so elected. On the 4th of November, 1872, an election took place. It had all the forms of an election, registration, polls, poll-lists, ballots, returns, registers, supervisors, &c. There were but two candidates, McEnery and Kellogg. One of those two men in fact had a majority of the legal votes cast unless there was a tie, and then we have nothing to do with the case, as the constitution of Louisiana provides that in that event the Legislature elects. One of the two must have had a majority of the legal votes; so the case cannot exist for a new election based on the fact that no one was elected. If we are to interfere it must be to find out who was elected governor and to place him in office.

To ascertain who by a majority of legal votes cast is entitled to an office, I had supposed was a matter over which the State courts had jurisdiction. If for any reasons the State courts have not jurisdiction, or if so corrupt that they cannot be trusted, then if we are to interfere we must address ourselves to the question, Who was elected? It cannot be advocated that, where it is a mathematical certainty that one of two candidates was elected, Congress shall order a new election, and thus set a premium on fraud. But we must find out who was elected.

The question as to who was elected governor does not seem to have attracted the attention of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There were two things referred to that committee: first, whether there was any government in Louisiana, and second, whether the Legislature which elected McMillen, or that which elected Ray, was the true Legislature; and the attention of the committee was directed to finding out which was the true board of canvassers, so as to determine which was the true Legislature, and thus to decide whether McMillen or Ray was prima facie entitled to the seat in the Senate which expired on the 4th of March last, and there is but little evidence as to who was elected governor. I am sorry there is not more; but the burden of proof is with those who seek the removal of one who has for two years acted as and claimed to be governor.

I submit that the moral evidence that McEnery had not a majority of the legal votes cast, and that consequently Kellogg had, is to my mind irresistible. Warmoth had the purpose, the intent, to carry that election by fraud. This is apparent, and is conceded. It is notorious that he, elected a republican, was to give the State to the democracy, and as a return was to grace the United States Senate. His legislature I understand, attempted to elect him, but this project was abandoned because it was thought it would interfere with the recognition of the State government by the General Government. He appointed a man named Blanchard to be register. That man has made an affidavit. If the affidavit be true his character is such that no one can approve; if it be untrue, comment is unnecessary. Blanchard appointed the supervisors in each parish or county, and the supervisor in each parish appointed three commissioners. To these were added three freeholders, who, with the commissioners, assisted the supervisors of the parish in counting the votes of the precincts. And we see at a glance that Warmoth could cheat Kellogg, but that Kellogg could not cheat Warmoth or McEnery. One could cheat. The organization of the election throughout the whole State originated with and was controlled by Warmoth. It is not denied that Warmoth meant fraud, and that he had the power to effect it. There was one circumstance which afforded great facility in carrying out this fraud. Almost every republican that came to the polls to be registered had a mark on him which said "I belong to the republican party;" he was a colored man. There were exceptions. There were some white republicans, but they were not so numerous that they were not known, so that it was an easy thing to make it difficult to get registration, or to secure the requisite identification between the voter and his registration papers.

It appears, then, that the McEnery party had the purpose to cheat, and had the organized machinery to effect their end. It looks as if, after all, the republican majority was too great for them. Warmoth knew that it was of the first importance that he should satisfy the public that McEnery had a majority, and how easily he could have done so. Instead of maneuvering to get a facile board of canvassers, instead of resorting to a legislative bill, which he as governor had carried for six months in his pocket and signing it so as to create a member of the canvassing board that suited him, all he need to have done was to call in twenty honest men in the State of Louisiana, republicans and democrats, take them to the State-house and there say, "Here are the returns; add them up in the presence of these interested parties." It was only a matter of addition. They could have publicly added them up, showed the result, and if any one standing by said "Those returns are false," all he need have done was to send to the supervisor of the parish whom he had appointed, and request him to bring the ballot-box and say, "There are the ballots; the returns are not false;" and if any one charged that the ballot-box had been stuffed or that there had been votes abstracted, all he need have done was to send for the poll-lists and say, "There are the poll-lists; they correspond with the ballots;" and if any one charged that the poll-lists were false in a given precinct of such a parish, all he need have done was to send a justice of the peace to that parish; every man who had there voted had indorsed on his registration papers the fact that he had voted, and if a living man he could swear how he had voted.

Now, Mr. President, when one bent on fraud has it in his power to prove to a demonstration that his candidate is elected and shirks the investigation, it is moral evidence, irresistible, that the investigation would have proven that his candidate was defeated.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me a word at that point?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator does not claim, of course, that there is any law authorizing any such investigation, or that anybody would have been indictable for perjury who should have come before that town meeting which he imagines, and sworn falsely?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is the best answer which can be made. But it is a matter perfectly immaterial whether the twenty honest men, ten democrats and ten republicans, whom he might have selected, were officials or not; the effect of their determination would have been the same on the public. There is in the case nothing that requires any oath; it is a matter of adding up the returns, and a matter of occular demonstration whether the ballots correspond with the returns, and whether the poll-lists conform with the ballots in the box; and the only situation in which an affidavit could be required is that of a charge being made that in some precinct the poll-list was false, and you would seek the voter with his registration paper with him, to ask him how he voted. Some one could have been found under their laws to take such affidavit.

Mr. President, did not Warmoth know that investigation would prove his candidate not elected? At all events, is there affirmative proof that McEnery was elected on which we can remove Kellogg? But instead of doing all this, Mr. Warmoth comes to Congress, not to ask that his candidate may be installed in office; but he comes to ask that he may not be installed in office. That would lead to investigation. He asks that we will order a new election. And the wonder is that in the Senate, among those who thought it unconstitutional to set aside the State Government when in the hands of those who had sworn hostility to the United States Government, among those who thought it unconstitutional to set aside those mockeries of government that Andrew Johnson had erected, now hold it to be constitutional at the instance of Mr. Warmoth to go into Louisiana and to regulate the domestic elections of that State!

Mr. President, views similar in some respects to those which I have expressed are set forth in the report of my friend from Wisconsin; for he agrees with me as to the vicious character of this election:

> A careful consideration of the testimony convinces us that, had the election of November last been fairly conducted and returned, Kellogg and his associates, and a Legislature composed of the same political party, would have been elected. The colored population of that State outnumbers the white, and in the last election the colored voters were almost unanimous in their support of the republican ticket. Governor Warmoth, who was elected by the republicans of the State in 1868, had passed into opposition, and held in his hands the entire machinery of the election. He appointed the supervisors of registration, and they appointed the commissioners of election. The testimony shows a systematic purpose on the part of those conducting the election to throw every possible difficulty in the way of the colored voters in the matter of registration. The polling places are not fixed by law, and at the last election they were purposely established by those conducting the election at places inconvenient of access in those parishes which were known to be largely republican; so that, in some instances, voters had to travel over twenty miles to reach the polls. The election was generally conducted in quiet, and was perhaps unusually free from disturbance or riot. Governor Warmoth, who was the master-spirit in the whole proceeding, seems to have relied upon craft rather than violence to carry the State for McEnery. In the canvass of votes, which determined the McEnery government to be elected, the votes of several republican parishes were rejected.

Mr. President, I further submit that, as might be expected from the circumstances referred to, we have nothing amounting to evidence that McEnery had any majority, and for these five reasons: First, the question has at best been only incidentally examined by the committee; second——

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator overlooks the fact that we had two inquiries before the committee: one, whether there was a State government in Louisiana. It is therefore not incidentally before us, but directly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will come to that. My second reason for saying that we have nothing amounting to evidence of McEnery's election is that from six out of fifty-eight parishes we have no returns; third, from several of the parishes the returns are forgeries; fourth, from one at least it is in proof by an eye-witness that the returns were manufactured and sworn to in blank before they were made.

Mr. CARPENTER. What case is that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will give it to you presently. Fifth, the preponderance of evidence is that Kellogg and not McEnery had a majority of the votes cast. Now I will say a word or two on each of these points.

That the committee did not give their attention to the question whether Kellogg or McEnery had the majority, no matter what the resolution says, is manifest from an examination of the case. Their attention was given to the question which was the true canvassing board so as to determine which was the true Legislature, in order that they might determine whether Ray or McMillen was prima facie entitled to be Senator; and if you want proof that this phase of the subject has not been examined, you have only to look to the report. On the last page of the book is this testimony; one witness, Mr. Ray, says:

I desire to call the attention of the committee to a statement. At a suggestion made by one member of the committee yesterday, I examined and found, and if the committee will act as experts they will find, that the commissioners of elections in several cases in the parishes have their names forged to the affidavits.

Mr. CARPENTER. In the parishes named, naming four parishes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think that is the meaning; but I will read it just as it is:

If the committee will act as experts they will find, that the commissioners of elections in several cases in the parishes have their names forged to the affidavits. For instance, there is one from Madison Parish, [exhibiting the papers,] and so in the parish of Grant also, and in the parish of Point Coupée and the parish of East Baton Rouge, which, if the committee will examine as experts, they will find it very evident in some cases that they were forged.

The CHAIRMAN. We will now consider the evidence in the Louisiana investigation closed, as I am advised by both sides that they have laid all the testimony before the committee that they desire to present.

Mr. CARPENTER. The returns being before the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, we are called upon to determine that Kellogg is not governor, when it was in proof before the committee that in several cases the returns were forged, the witness instancing four cases, and not a question was asked or any testimony taken in reference to the matter. Why, you might as well throw up figures on cards to see how they will land in order to solve a mathematical demonstration as to establish a majority by such testimony.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me a word? These returns were before the committee. Mr. Ray, the witness called there, did not pretend to have any knowledge about it except what arose from looking at the papers.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is all.

Mr. CARPENTER. He and Mr. McMillen, both being Senators as they claimed, and therefore perfectly competent to settle this question for themselves, attached no importance to that from the fact that it did not change the result if it was so; and the returns were left with the committee after that time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will pay attention to those returns before I close, and in a few minutes. It is clear that the committee did not attempt to find out what returns were forged and what were not, for on the presentation of this controlling fact the whole testimony was closed and the report is based on the testimony as it then stood.

Again, from six out of fifty-eight parishes we have no returns—Iberia, Iberville, Saint James, Saint Martin, Saint Tammany, Terrebonne—as appears by the certificate of the Forman board found on page 81 of the report. It is said that three of these six parishes were rejected because of violence. Forman says so in his testimony on the seventy-sixth page. They have given no evidence of the violence excepting in one case, and that is spread out from the six hundred and fifth to the six hundred and forty-first page—thirty-five pages of evidence relating the alleged violence in the parish of Iberville. This was a republican parish, having a strong preponderance of colored votes. There were from seven to eight hundred white votes and three thousand colored votes registered. The white vote was made up, as we know, of the democrats, and in that parish of democratic planters. To their credit be it said that there seems to have been no man in the parish who suited Mr. Warmoth as supervisor, and a Mr. Tharp was brought from New Orleans and was made supervisor. The commissioners took the ballot-boxes with the poll-lists to Plaquemines. The colored men were orderly, but when voting was over they armed and followed the ballot-boxes to Plaquemines. They claimed the right to go into the State-house. The sheriff prohibited them. They had a right to go in. We would have gone in. They, intent and earnest, watched that ballot-box. When one party would grow weary others would relieve them, and they stood at the windows watching the boxes.

In all the testimony of thirty-five pages there is no evidence of one act of violence; and that is one of the three parishes the returns of which were rejected because of violence. What the violence was in the other two parishes they have not had the grace to give us one word of testimony to inform us. There was no violence. There was no reason that the ballots should not have been counted and the returns made up, excepting that it was a strong republican parish. I will show presently the effect of the exclusion of these parishes.

The returns from several of the parishes are forged, but they all go in to make up McEnery's majority, as we shall see presently. The Senator from Wisconsin very fairly, in a calculation with which I, having gone over the figures, entirely agree, makes a deduction for those parishes. From one of the parishes the returns were manufactured; and there my friend asks me for the evidence, and I will trouble the Clerk to read from pages 909 and 910 of the testimony—that which I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, Parish of Orleans, City of New Orleans:

Personally came and appeared before me, Robert H. Shannon, United States commissioner in and for the district of Louisiana, John P. Montamat, of the city and State aforesaid, who, being duly sworn, doth depose and say that during the month of November, 1872, and for four years before, he was a justice of the peace for this parish of Orleans; that in the month aforesaid, after the election held in this parish for governor and other State and parochial officers, "what date I cannot recollect, but it was while they were counting the votes at the State-house, at the Mechanics' Institute, situated on Dryades street," one Jack Wharton, also of this city and parish aforsaid, came to my office, situated No. 33 Exchange alley, near Custom-house street, in this city and parish aforesaid, and requested that I should go with him in a certain place in this city of New Orleans, in order to administer the oath to one of the supervisors of election in and for the parish of Madison. At said request I went with Jack Wharton, who took me in a house situated on Gravier street, somewhere near Barronne street; the entry-doors were closed, and at the signal given by Jack Wharton, (three consecutive and hard raps,) the doors were opened. In the said room I saw one Cahoon, whose first name I do not know, but whom I had seen before in this city; he, the said Cahoon, then and there informed me that he was the supervisor of election for the parish of Madison, appointed by Henry C. Warmoth, then governor of Louisiana, and that he wished me to swear him as to the returns of the late election. I saw there several persons whom I did not know; they were making up tally-lists of the returns of the election for the parish of Madison. The lists were signed in blank by the commissioners of election. I inquired from Cahoon, the supervisor, how it was that he had not prepared the lists and returns in the parish where he came from. He told me that he could not count the votes there; it was a republican parish, and that he had to run away because he wanted to count the votes, and admit no one except a few, and he would have it his own way, and would here in New Orleans return such persons as he thought proper. I swore him to several tally-lists and returns. I believe, to the best of my knowledge, that the greater part of the tally-lists were yet in blank when I swore him.

JOHN P. MONTAMAT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 3d day of February, 1873.

[SEAL.] R. H. SHANNON,
United States Commissioner, District of Louisiana.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There was a secret place entered by arranged signals where officers were engaged in making up returns, a number of which were sworn to in blank and filled up afterward. Now read, if you please, the rest of that marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Question. Taking your estimate of the votes in these parishes where these frauds are charged, if the vote had been fairly counted, what would have been the result as compared with the vote in the parishes where no frauds are charged?

Answer. I do not understand your question.

By Mr. HILL:

Q. What would have been the effect on the general election?

By Mr. LOGAN:

Q. What would have been the result of the election?

A. O, if there had been no frauds in these parishes, and they had returned the vote as they did in some of the parishes, fairly, they would have given the republican ticket a very large majority, according to their own returns.

Q. In the State?

A. Yes, sir; in the State.

Q. Do you speak of the votes actually cast, or the voters in the district?

A. I refer to the voters; but the votes actually cast, in my judgment, if properly returned, would have given the republican party a majority in the State. I have no doubt of that.

Q. That is, the votes as they were actually cast?

A. Yes, sir; as actually put in the boxes.

Mr. MORTON. I ask what parish that was?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A parish some two hundred miles away.

Mr. WEST. The parish of Madison.

Mr. MORTON. How far away?

Mr. WEST. It is three hundred miles from New Orleans.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, let us look at the effect of the facts I have called attention to upon McEnery's majority. They claim for McEnery a majority of 9,606. The four parishes where there were forgeries and the six parishes from which there are no returns, according to the Lynch board, give Kellogg a majority of 7,295.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is not pretended that all the returns in those parishes were forged, but only one or two of them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It probably is much worse than those four parishes. They are mere illustrations. The returns from those the witness holds up and says, for instance, these are forged. He says there were forgeries in several parishes, and instances these four. Now take the 7,295 majority in six parishes not returned and in four in which the returns were forged from the 9,606, and it leaves McEnery's majority, as the Senator from Wisconsin agrees, 2,611. Now let us see what becomes of that 2,611 majority. Let anybody who wants to examine this read the three hundred and sixth page of the testimony which was sent here with the President's message. There is Caddo Parish. The white registration was 1,549 and McEnery's vote 1,837—nearly 300 more than the white registration. The colored registration was 3,139, and Kellogg's vote 1,576, or 1,563 less than the colored registration. This shows fraud not before but after the election. It points to a falsification of returns, for frauds in keeping men back from the polls probably would not give McEnery 300 more votes than there were white votes registered.

Mr. CARPENTER. How can you tell whether a ballot was cast by a black man or a white man?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; but my friend's report states that the colored men were republicans as a general rule, and the whites democrats. Take Rapides Parish. The white registry was 1,011; McEnery's vote was 1,960, or 949 more than the white registration. In Natchitoches the white registration was 1,486, and McEnery's vote

1,230; the colored registration was 1,875, and Kellogg's vote only 55. In Bossier Parish the white registration was 578; McEnery's vote 953, or 375 more than the white registration; the colored registration 1,795, and the vote for Kellogg 555. It is perfectly apparent that the fraud was in the returns as well as in the manner in which the election was conducted.

But again, take another view of these returns. There are fifty-eight parishes in Louisiana. In twenty-four—Ascension, Bienville, Calcasieu, Caldwell, Cameron, Carroll, Claiborne, Concordia, East Feliciana, Franklin, Jackson, Jefferson, Lafayette, Livingston, Ouachita, Pointe Coupée, Red River, Sabine, Saint Bernard, Saint Charles, Saint John Baptist, Tangipahoa, Tensas, and Orleans—which are those where there is not much difference between the two boards of canvassers in the result, in those twenty-four parishes by the Forman board there is an aggregate of 36,679 democratic votes and 36,203 republican votes, giving a democratic majority of 476. According to the Lynch board the republican vote was 35,590 and the democratic vote 33,817, giving a republican majority of 1,673. The Forman board gives a democratic majority of 476 and the Lynch board a republican majority of 1,673, no very great difference for such an election; average it, and call it a majority of 1,000 for Kellogg. The vote was close and the registration was correspondingly so. The white registration was 52,979 and the colored registration was 51,469. The democratic vote and the white registration, the republican vote and the colored registration correspond.

Now look to the remaining thirty-four parishes. By the Forman board the democratic vote is in the aggregate 27,788; the republican vote 20,170, giving a democratic majority of 7,618. This is manifestly a fraud, and is thus shown. In those thirty-four parishes the registration of whites was 34,786, and that registration gives a democratic vote of 27,788. The registration of the colored people was 42,879, and that gives a republican vote of only 20,170. If the same ratio of republican votes was given for the 42,000 colored registered voters as of democratic votes given by 34,000 white registered votes, which was 27,788, the republican vote would be 35,000 instead of 20,170.

Now let us see what becomes of McEnery's majority. The difference between 35,000, the true vote by all the analogies of this case and according to the Lynch board, and the 20,170 that the Forman returns give for these thirty-four parishes is 14,830. Take from that McEnery's majority of 9,606, and it leaves Kellogg's majority 4,924. Add to the 4,924 the majority which Kellogg had in the twenty-four parishes, and it makes Kellogg's majority 5,924.

You may turn this subject any way you please, and you will find that Kellogg was not only the representative of the will and intention of the people, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, but that he had a majority of the legal votes cast. At all events there is no affirmative proof on which to displace him.

Shall we turn Kellogg out of office, when all admit that he represents the will of the people and when the preponderance of evidence is that he had a majority of votes cast, for the sake of giving effect to the fraud which was most infamously perpetrated in that Louisiana election?

A word more, Mr. President, and I have done. There is another view of this case conclusive against a new election. We are considering this case as a Legislature and not as a court; we are exercising political, not judicial powers. A court is confined to the record, must decide upon the issue, must be controlled by rigid and fixed rules. If a case is brought before it it must decide it. A Legislature has a broad discretion; it has an arbitrary discretion, except so far as it is controlled by the constitution of the country and by good conscience. The Senator from Wisconsin, not in reference to this case particularly, but in stating the principle of the bill, holds that Congress has the right, without any application coming from a State, where the State courts have declared an election to be valid, to set aside the election and to order a new one. I cannot agree with him, and am glad that there is one relief to this prodigious power. The Senator from Wisconsin states the relief while stating the power. He says:

> The question is in its nature political, not judicial; and no court, State or national, can settle it so as to preclude Congress from inquiring into it and settling the question for itself.

It is a relief to know that we need not exercise the power, its exercise being left to our political discretion. What propriety is there in ordering a new election in Louisiana? It would be a sheer volunteer act. No one asks our interference. The governor is in office; the General Government acquiesces; laws are enacted; contracts made, and rights vested. All agree that Kellogg represents the wishes of the people, and it seems as if the preponderance of evidence is that Kellogg had a majority of the votes cast. And here let me say that I do not agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that Congress is making a precedent even if it does not order a new election. We are no more doing so in the exercise of a political discretion on this subject than we are whenever we refuse to pass a bill. Our discretion is arbitrarily controlled only by the Constitution and by good conscience.

In reference to the Legislature I have nothing to say. It would be very unwise to order an election for members of the Legislature, for an election under the laws of the State will take place as soon as could be had under a law of Congress. The bill, I think, should not pass.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. I presume the Senator from Louisiana hardly desires to go on this evening. If he does not, I will move that the Senate go into executive session.

Mr. WEST. As there seems to be quite a number of Senators absent from the Chamber, I will yield to that motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 14, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MISPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. SHELDON. On yesterday, it will be remembered, I introduced a substitute for a bill for the construction of a canal from the Mississippi River to the Gulf of Mexico, and obtained from the House an order that it be printed in the RECORD, and also printed in bill form for the use of the House. I find upon examination that in preparing the bill for the printer the tenth section of the Eads bill has been made the ninth section of my bill. I ask that the bill be reprinted, both in bill form and in the RECORD, in a correct form, leaving out the ninth section.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The bill was as follows:

A bill for the construction of a canal from the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana, to the Gulf of Mexico.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, in the most expeditious manner, a thorough, detailed, and final survey and location of a canal from the Mississippi River, at some point below Fort Saint Philip, in the State of Louisiana, on the left bank, and terminating at some point most eligible in the deep waters of the Breton Harbor or Pass. The survey and report of the engineers assigned to this duty shall exhibit complete plans and specifications of the work in the construction of such canal, and the estimates of the cost of each portion of the work shall accompany and form part of the report of such survey; and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of such survey.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War shall, on the receipt of such report, and without unnecessary delay, advertise for bids to construct said canal as a whole, for such time and in such newspapers as he may think sufficient; and he shall award the contract to the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, who shall give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of said Secretary, that the work shall be done according to the stipulations of such contract: Provided, That no bid shall be received except the same is accompanied with a deposit with the said Secretary of the sum of $25,000, which sum shall be forfeited to the United States and paid into the Treasury thereof in case such bidder fails for a period of thirty days, after notice that his bid has been accepted, to make a contract in accordance with the terms of his bid and give security as required by this act: Provided further, That the contractor or contractors shall perform their work according to the plans and specifications of the Engineer Department, and under the directions thereof: And provided further, That said canal shall be fully completed for use within a period of three years from the day of contract, and that the entire cost of such canal shall not exceed the sum of $10,000,000.

SEC. 3. That the said canal shall not be less than two hundred feet wide on the bottom, and not less than twenty-seven feet deep, and shall have the proper locks, gates, waste-weirs, and other appurtenances necessary to facilitate the passage of ships to and from the said river and the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico; and it shall be so constructed in all respects as will make it a permanent channel; and the contractor or contractors shall be paid quarterly in 5 per cent. bonds, (gold interest, payable semi-annually,) which bonds are to run for forty years, 90 per cent. of the value of the work done and materials delivered, which shall be estimated and certified to by the officer of engineers in charge of the work upon actual and careful examination; and upon completion of contract the percentage reserved shall be paid to the contractor in like bonds, bearing date of the several estimates.

SEC. 4. That all the dredge-boats, implements, tools, machinery, and materials procured by any contractor for the construction of said canal, or any part thereof, shall be forfeited to the United States in case of failure of such contractor to comply with his contract; and the Secretary of War is required to take possession of and use the same in the construction of said canal whenever in his judgment any contractor has failed to comply with his contract; and no suit or proceeding by such contractor shall be entertained by any court that shall deprive the Secretary aforesaid of the use of such dredge-boats, implements, tools, machinery, and materials; and whenever any contractor shall fail as aforesaid, the said Secretary shall cause the work to be done by the Engineer Department, or let the same to other contractors in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That if said Secretary of War shall be unable to make contracts for the construction of said canal for a period of six months after receiving the report of the survey required by the first section of this act, he shall cause the Engineer Department to commence the construction of said canal without delay; and the same to be completed in the shortest period possible.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall execute bonds of the United States for such an amount as is necessary to defray the expenses of constructing said canal, in sums of $1,000 each, payable forty years from date, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. payable semi-annually, in gold coin, which bonds shall be delivered from time to time as is required by the provisions of this act: Provided, The entire sum shall not exceed $10,000,000; and in case the United States shall construct said canal in whole or in part, said bonds may be sold by said Secretary of the Treasury from time to time for not less than par, and the proceeds applied in defraying the expenses of such work.

SEC. 7. That when completed, the said canal and appurtenances shall be the property of the United States, and a free channel of commerce; and shall be under the control and management of the Secretary of War until otherwise provided by law.

SEC. 8. That if hereafter Congress shall make an appropriation of money to defray the expense of constructing said canal, the Secretary of War shall pay in money to the extent of such appropriation in lieu of bonds, and any bonds not delivered in consequence of such appropriation shall be canceled and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

NATIONAL MILITARY AND NAVAL HOME.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) authorizing the appointment of a manager to fill a vacancy in the board of managers of the National Military and Naval Home for the relief of totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to cause an examination or survey to be made of a bank of mud which has been found in Hudson River, opposite Jersey City, extending from near Pavonia Ferry down said river, and below the wharves in Jersey City, with a view to dredging and removing said bank of mud, so as to afford greater protection to commerce; and that he be requested to report upon the feasibility of making such improvement, and the probable cost thereof, to the House of Representatives.

SURVEY OF NORTHERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations, for passage now, a bill which it seems to be necessary to have acted upon at once. It is a bill making an appropriation to complete the survey of the northern boundary of the United States adjoining the British possessions.

The bill was read. It provides that for the purpose of completing during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, the work of surveying and marking the boundary between the territory of the United States and the possessions of Great Britain from the Lake of the Woods to the summit of the Rocky Mountains $150,000 be appropriated, to be available from the date of the passage of the act, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, with the approval of the President.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that this appropriation would properly come in the regular miscellaneous appropriation bill; but letters from the Secretary of State, which I hold in my hand, show it to be important that the commission should begin their work immediately, while the season is good.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. There was an appropriation made for this purpose in the regular appropriation bill of last year. Has that appropriation been all expended?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has. There is no deficiency asked.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This makes a deficiency.

Mr. SCOFIELD. When it was first proposed to remark this boundary, it was stated by the committee that $100,000 would do the whole work.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, the gentleman is mistaken. The estimate of the engineer——

Mr. SCOFIELD. Made when?

Mr. GARFIELD. Year before last.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It was before that that this work began; and every year we have gone on appropriating the same amount. But now we are asked to appropriate more than heretofore—$150,000. I would like the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to tell us now when he is going to get done asking for appropriations to run this line.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will tell the gentleman. There have been two appropriations——

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I object to the bill.

JAMES RIVER AND KANAWHA CANAL.

Mr. SENER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House the report of the Chief of the United States Engineer Department on the practicability of a water line of transportation between the Ohio River and the sea-board via the James River and Kanawha Canal route.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a personal explanation. During the debate yesterday I was asked by my colleague [Mr. LUTTRELL] whether I was not a mail contractor, and whether my name did not appear on the books as such. I answered in the affirmative. That statement requires a qualification, which I desire now to make. In 1870 I was the accepted bidder on three or four mail-routes in the State of California. I entered upon the contract on the 1st day of July, 1870. My contract would expire on June 30 of the present year. After my election to Congress, I wrote to my predecessor, now in the Senate, Mr. SARGENT, asking him to request the Department to annul my contract and relieve me from it. The Postmaster-General replied to Mr. SARGENT that he could not do so, quoting the opinion of the Attorney-General that a contract for carrying the mails could not be annulled on account of the subsequent election of the contractor as a member of Congress. The law also prevented me from assigning the contract, as will appear from section 271 of the law on this subject, which section reads as follows:

That no contractor for transporting the mails within or between the United States and any foreign country shall assign or transfer his contract; and all such assignments or transfers shall be null and void.

I desire further to say that I have not made any contract since 1870; and, except to the extent I have stated, I have no interest directly or indirectly in any mail contract or any other contract with the Government. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the opinion of the Attorney-General in regard to contractors who, subsequent to taking their contracts, are elected to Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

The statute applies to contracts entered into with persons who are at the time members of Congress. This appears from a comprehensive view of the first section, and is confirmed by the fourth, which imposes a penalty on any officer of the United States who shall enter into any contract "with any member of Congress." If obtaining a seat in Congress subsequent to the contract would annul it, any person who had made what he considered a bad bargain might, if he had influence enough to procure his election, relieve himself from the burden. My opinion, therefore, is, that the contract is not destroyed; that both parties are bound to fulfill their respective engagements; and that the penalties of the act of Congress do not attach in the case.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to direct the attention of the House to one fact bearing on this question, of one who is elected a member of Congress and is a mail contractor at the same time. If my memory serves me right, Senator CORBETT, of Oregon, was a mail contractor when he came here, and the Congress of the United States passed an act relieving him from the obligations of his mail contract in consequence of his assumption of his seat in the Senate. I think the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] so far as I can learn the facts, has done everything within his power to place himself in a proper position before the Congress of the United States in that particular.

BISMARCK LAND DISTRICT.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota, with the recommendation that it do pass. It is an important bill, and is in the interest of the actual settlers along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. I ask it be read.

The bill was read. The first section provides that all that portion of Dakota Territory lying north of the seventh standard parallel and west of the ninth guide meridian be, and the same is hereby, created into a separate land district, to be known as the Bismarck district; and the land office for said district shall be located at the town of Bismarck, where the North Pacific Railroad intersects the Missouri River. The second section provides that a register and a receiver shall be appointed for said district land office, who shall be governed by the same laws and receive the same compensation as prescribed for similar officers in the other land districts of said Territory.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish to say a word——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to change the name of this land district to that of "the Northern Dakota land district."

Mr. DUNNELL. It is to be located at Bismarck, on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. It is two hundred miles from any existing land office. It is required in the interest of the settlers along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. Bismarck is an important town on the line of that road.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In my judgment it should not have any such name.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is to be located where the Northern Pacific Railroad line crosses the Missouri River. I hope there will be no objection to it. The Commissioner of the General Land Office recommends the passage of the bill. He says it is necessary at the present time. There are thousands of settlers along the line of that road who are now two hundred miles from any land office. If any gentleman objects I hope he will give us some good reason for objecting. This is four hundred miles from the Yankton land office, three hundred miles from the Sioux land office, and two hundred miles from Pembina. There are thousands of settlers there at this time. There are thousands of settlers waiting to make entries at the land office, and I trust the gentleman from Maine will not object.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My objection of course is only as a matter of taste. I acknowledge it does not suit me, in creating one of our new land districts in one of our Territories, to borrow a name entirely alien to us, and I therefore object to calling this the Bismarck land district. It is a great deal better, it seems to me, as a matter of taste, that we should call it the Northern Dakota land district. If we now call this the Bismarck land district, some one else will come here and want to call a new land district "the Louis Napoleon land district," and others will want other names of a like alien character.

Mr. DUNNELL. This is the important point on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. AVERILL. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to antagonize the taste of thousands of settlers who have recently gone there and established an enterprising town which they have called Bismarck? Does he propose to antagonize the taste of these settlers?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I suppose the settlers reap as much benefit from us as we do from them. As a matter of taste I do think, however, when they come here, they should not bring with them their old European names.

Mr. AVERILL. Is it not a matter of necessity to give it this name?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot understand any German republican (and I believe only German republicans come here to make settlement upon our lands) would be in favor of having our land districts designated by any such names.

Mr. AVERILL. What is the objection to it?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I prefer for one that it should be called the Northern Dakota instead of the Bismarck land district.

Mr. AVERILL. Does the gentleman propose that the name of the town of Bismarck should be changed?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not ask that; but here it is proposed that we shall establish a new land district, and I prefer it should be called the Northern Dakota land district.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask the gentleman to answer my question. As a matter of necessity must not a land office bear the same name as the town at which it is located?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If I thought so I should not make objection. This land district is to be established not alone for the town of Bismarck, but for Northern Dakota, and it should be called the Northern Dakota land district.

Mr. DUNNELL. There must be some locality designated at which the land office is to be established.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The land district is to be for Northern Dakota, and it will have its headquarters at this town. I do not ask that the name of the town should be changed; no one objects to that. But I do object to subdividing a Territory or a State of the United States and giving to one of the subdivisions a foreign name as a land district. I would not be in favor of creating a new custom-house district in Maine and naming it after an English admiral or a French admiral. It would not be in good taste, according to my notions.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not understand that the gentleman really objects.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object to the name. The gentleman can easily change the name to "Northern Dakota."

Mr. AVERILL. That is impossible, because it would antagonize the law, which requires that the land office shall bear the name of the town where it is situated.

Mr. HOLMAN. This proposed land office is to be located on the Missouri River, on the Northern Pacific Railroad. I wish to ask to what extent lands have been surveyed in that portion of the Territory of Dakota?

Mr. DUNNELL. Lands have been surveyed all along the line within the railroad limits.

Mr. HOLMAN. Confined within the railroad limits?

Mr. DUNNELL. Not wholly confined to them. But the Delegate from Dakota may be able to answer the question more accurately than myself. Vast quantities of land in that locality have been surveyed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. While this discussion is progressing I reserve my right of objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where is the nearest land office now?

Mr. DUNNELL. The nearest is distant two hundred miles, and my colleague says it is four hundred miles to Pembina. If this land office is not established the settlers are to be subjected to the great trouble of going that distance without any gain at all to the Government. It is a great burden to these settlers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps the gentleman will allow me one other question. There is never a session of Congress in which we do not establish some new land office; but so far as I am aware we never receive any reports from the Committee on the Public Lands in favor of abolishing any of these offices. At all these offices there are officers to be kept up year after year, and new officers are appointed year after year. All the time the business of the public lands is going westward, rendering the offices behind quite useless, and yet they are not abolished.

Mr. DUNNELL. I beg to inform the gentleman from Indiana that land offices are abolished year after year. There is but one now remaining in Michigan. There are none remaining in Iowa. There are one or two which it is expected will be abolished within a year or two in my own State. I think it ought to be a matter of congratulation that we need new offices in the Territories, but I entirely agree with the gentleman from Indiana that offices which have become unnecessary should be abolished.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall be obliged to call the regular order.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand there is no objection to the passage of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been called, the morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are still in order from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

CUSTOMS REVENUE SERVICE.

Mr. WOODFORD, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2977) to provide for a commission for the reorganization of the customs revenue service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2978) to provide for the reorganization of the Treasury Department of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the bill be made a special order in Committee of the Whole House for Tuesday, April 28, at half-past one o'clock, to the exclusion of all other orders except appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman also to except reports from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am willing to except reports from the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations, and I will also except private-bill days.

Mr. DAWES. The exception will apply to reports yet to be made?

The SPEAKER. Of course. But to accomplish his purpose it will be necessary for the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] to ask that a further arrangement be made; because he will find, at least on Tuesday, sundry special orders in Committee of the Whole ahead of this on the Calendar. The gentleman had better include in his motion, that with the exceptions he has indicated the House may by a majority vote reach this order on going into Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not wish to antagonize any important business of the House. But it has gone out, especially from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] in the speech which we all remember, that we ought to reform the Treasury Department, and this bill is for that purpose.

Mr. SHELDON. Will one objection prevent the proposed arrangement being made? If so, I object. I do it in all kindness to the gentleman from Connecticut, for there is a special order now pending of so much consequence to the South and West that I cannot agree to anything which will cause its postponement.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. SHELDON. It is the bill for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. That is the special order for a week after, and the two cannot come in conflict, because this bill will be in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHELDON. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There is a special order for the consideration of the Army bill.

The SPEAKER. The two cannot come in conflict.

There being no objection, the motion of Mr. KELLOGG was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to move that five hundred extra copies of the bill be printed.

The SPEAKER. The House cannot order the printing of extra copies. A resolution to that effect will have to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well; I will prepare a resolution.

APPRAISERS OF IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. KELLOGG from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported (as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 1959) a bill (H. R. No. 2979) abolishing the office of appraiser of imported merchandise, appointed under the act of July 14, 1870, and the acts amendatory thereof, at certain places; which was read a first and second time.

The bill proposes to repeal so much of the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth sections of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1870, and the acts amendatory thereof, as provides for the appointment of appraisers of imported merchandise at the following-named places: Providence, Rhode Island; Portland, Oregon; Cleveland, Ohio; Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Memphis, Tennessee; Evansville, Indiana; Louisville, Kentucky; Norfolk, Virginia; Mobile, Alabama; Toledo, Ohio, and Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; and provides that from and after the passage of the act there shall be but one appraiser of imported merchandise at each of the following-named places: Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Baltimore, Maryland; Charleston, South Carolina, and Savannah, Georgia.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask action on this bill now, entering a motion to recommit; but I shall yield to several gentlemen for amendments.

Mr. DAWES. While I do not object to the gentleman from Connecticut taking away from the Committee on Ways and Means the entire business of that committee, I ask him to let us have a little notice of it, so that, perhaps, we might modify our own work a little. We have been employed now for three or four weeks on this matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. How long time does the gentleman want?

Mr. DAWES. Only a few minutes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. DAWES. Five minutes will be enough for me to suggest to the gentleman that, while I do not object to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service taking the entire customs matter right out of the hands of the Committee on Ways and Means, I will not say a word if he will let us know in season, because we have considerable work of that kind, and have spent a good deal of time on it, and have our bills prepared and are only waiting to be called to report them. It is really unkind in the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service that they should let us go on in this way working upon those bills and hearing parties and getting information and co-operation from the Treasury Department, which is perfecting our bills in this particular; they ought to let us have notice of their action.

Now, I suggest to the gentleman in all kindness, not because I want to take this matter out of his hands, that he should just postpone action on this bill for a day or two and we will eliminate out of the work of the Committee on Ways and Means everything pertaining to the customs service and turn it over to them and there shall be no conflict between us. We will not antagonize this ambitious young committee who are doing a grand work, and I want to help them all I can; only my committee do not want to do the same work over at the same time, because we know we shall not do it so well; we know that it will show how imperfect our own work is.

I therefore suggest to my friend, in the five minutes that he has kindly yielded to the Committee on Ways and Means to express their views upon the great subject of remodeling the customs service of the United States, that he allow his bill to be postponed. I thank him for yielding even that, and will say no more.

Mr. KELLOGG. Whatever action the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service has taken in this matter has been done under an order of the House, made on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] in December last, and the gentleman from Massachusetts did not object. We have not sought to take anything from the honorable Committee on Ways and Means; for we know we are so overshadowed by it that we can hardly do more than creep about under their huge legs, asking permission to stay on the floor of the House. But when we were ordered by a vote of the House, without objection on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to see what reform we could make in the civil service of the Government, and we found a few useless officers, we thought it the duty of our committee to act, and to strike them off; and we did not by any means take our cue from the gentleman's speech made in February last. In January the attention of the committee was called to this matter; a letter was written to the Treasury Department, and we received a reply in the latter part of January saying that certain officers were appointed under this law of July 14, 1870, and I had an intimation that some of them might be dispensed with.

The committee afterward sought information from the Treasury Department for the purpose of determining which of these officers should be dispensed with; and they received the list which I have embraced in the bill now presented to the House. We did not seek to interfere with the work of the Committee on Ways and Means, and we do not do it by this bill. We simply abolish some thirteen or fourteen useless offices, saving to the Treasury some $40,000 annually, which the gentleman from Massachusetts made such a point about in his speech; and which, in all courtesy to him, I submit deserved some action on his part, either in the last Congress or the Congress before, when he was at the head of the committee that should have made this reform. If any committee acts upon the subject now, a censure should not come from his lips; it should not come from him to say that we should wait for the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill of this kind. We reported a bill a little while ago, which was passed by the House, abolishing the office of deputy collector of internal revenue. Another such officer is also abolished by our action in committee, and is embraced in the bill reported this morning for the reorganization of the Treasury Department.

Now, finding a list of appraisers at these ports who had nothing to do, as the gentleman stated in his speech—and members will recollect that he read a feeling letter from some decapitated officer when he made his speech—I thought it the duty of the Civil Service Reform Committee to abolish some of these useless offices, and we have done so. We do not know but we shall get in a scrape by it, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says he always does when he undertakes some particular reform. And that fact, by the way, may account for his course heretofore upon the subject; he has always been loud-spoken in favor of general reform, but never makes any special effort to accomplish any particular reform. And that is what we are seeking to do, by the action of our ambitious young committee, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] styles us.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I notice that this bill provides that there shall be but one appraiser at Philadelphia.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is but one there now. There is a law providing for two appraisers at Philadelphia, but there is a vacancy there now, as the gentleman will find by turning to the Finance Report. There is one appraiser there now, and he has two assistants. This bill does not interfere with the assistants at all, but it provides for only one head, which is thought by us to be best for the interests of the service——

Mr. SCOFIELD. They have one appraiser-general and one appraiser at Philadelphia. I apprehend that if we pass this bill it will abolish the office of appraiser-general.

Mr. KELLOGG. Not at all. This bill provides that there shall be one appraiser at Philadelphia; the law now provides for two, but there is only one now appointed. It is another law that provides for a general appraiser.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The law gives one appraiser and one appraiser-general, if I understand it. The appraiser-general has nothing to do with the appraisal of goods in the first instance.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I will modify the bill so as to provide for one appraiser-general at Philadelphia, if I find it necessary to prevent his removal.

Mr. DAWES. I make the point of order on the gentleman that he is under two disabilities in regard to moving amendments; one is that he has entered a motion to recommit so that nobody can move an amendment, and the other is that he represents the committee and has no right to change what they have directed him to report.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] again; if he asks me I will do it, for I always yield to him.

Mr. DAWES. I have raised a point of order upon the gentleman.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I will not modify the bill, but will leave the question to the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Concurring with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] in his motives, I will say that I was afraid this bill would abolish the office of appraiser-general. It is now occupied by a gentleman known to a great many persons in this House, Mr. Lorin Blodgett, a man of great ability.

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not interfere with him at all, and certainly was not designed to touch his case.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Some time ago a movement was made in the Treasury Department, as we supposed, to get rid of Mr. Blodgett because—well, I will not say why, for it might do great injustice to some one. But when the gentleman said that this bill came from the Treasury Department, I did not know but the jealousy of Mr. Blodgett might have crept in, and obtained the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury without his knowing it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think not; but the gentleman misunderstood me, if he thought I said this bill came from the Treasury Department; for it did not. I sought information in certain places there, and proposed the bill in consequence of that information.

Mr. MYERS. That officer has probably rendered more efficient service than any other single officer of the Government.

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not interfere with him at all. I do not question his services.

Mr. SCOFIELD. By referring to the Blue Book I find among the officers at Philadelphia, "general appraiser, Lorin Blodgett; appraiser, E. B. Moore;" that is all there is, one general appraiser and one appraiser. There are two assistant appraisers; and if the gentleman wants to abolish them I have no objection.

Mr. MYERS. I have very great objections, because they are needed.

Mr. KELLOGG. We do not propose to abolish the general appraiser or the assistant appraisers. There is but one local appraiser appointed at Philadelphia, as I understand, and there is a vacancy under the law, which we think need not be filled, and that that office should be abolished.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Blodgett is the general appraiser.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the bill be read again, so that gentlemen may see what we do provide in it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will move to strike out the words "Philadelphia, Pennsylvania."

Mr. KELLOGG. I will withdraw the motion to recommit for that purpose.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I desire to make a point of order on the bill, that as it proposes to abolish offices now provided for by law it must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That point of order would have been good if made in time; but this bill has been some fifteen minutes before the House, and the point of order is too late.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania wishes to move an amendment to strike out Philadelphia, I will withdraw the motion to recommit and yield for that purpose.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to strike out "Philadelphia, Pennsylvania."

Mr. DAWES. I make the point of order that no amendment can be offered while the motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. SCOFIELD. As I understand, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] withdraws the motion to recommit for the purpose of allowing me to move this amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir; I withdrew the motion to recommit for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit being withdrawn, the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the amendment he has indicated.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KELLOGG. I cannot yield to the gentleman now. I will when I get through.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will yield for that purpose only.

Mr. CONGER. Does not this bill abolish the office of appraiser at interior ports of entry where there is no other officer to attend to the duties?

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not. There are several other officers who can do the work, or the duties of an appraiser can be imposed upon them by law.

Mr. CONGER. For instance, at Evansville, Indiana——

Mr. KELLOGG. There are other officers there to do the work. The salaries now cost more than the collections amount to. There are two or three other officers there.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say to the gentleman that the appraiser at Evansville does not hold his place under the old law, but by virtue of a more recent law creating interior ports of entry; and as my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, is aware, for an interior port of entry the appraiser is the only officer. There is no appraiser connected with Evansville as a port of delivery; but there is an appraiser there under the law of 1870 or 1871, making it an interior port of entry; and that appraiser is the only officer recognized at that port.

Mr. HOLMAN. The effect of this bill is to abolish the port of entry at Evansville; and that I think very proper if other ports of the same character are abolished.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will answer the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] if he will allow me.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say a word further. At each of the lake ports mentioned in the bill there is no appraiser in the regular list of officers connected with it as a port of entry under the general laws of the United States. But under the laws establishing interior ports of entry, such as Evansville, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and Milwaukee, there is one officer appointed at each place to make them interior ports of entry. The gentleman now proposes to abolish these ports of entry by abolishing the only officer there. I ask the gentleman whether he knew that there was such a distinction between appraisers at the interior ports of entry and appraisers on the sea-coast?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am aware of the distinction. If the gentleman will turn to the finance report and look at the list of officers at each one of these places he will be convinced that there is ample force to do the work without the appraisers, and the work can be put upon them by law.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed the gentleman might not be familiar with the law constituting interior ports of entry with an appraiser as the only officer. He may be familiar with that fact, but I cannot see the indication of it in this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do. The bill is based upon the law of July 14, 1870, that the gentleman refers to. We do not interfere in this bill with the gentleman's port in Michigan, though we would have put it in if we had had a recommendation to that effect, or any proof that it was a needless office, as in these other cases.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say to the gentleman that the port to which he refers, Port Huron, is the largest port of importation on the lakes. Most if not all of the trade that comes into the United States by the Saint Lawrence enters at that port.

A MEMBER. It has more business than New Haven, Connecticut.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; the importations at that port are larger than at New Haven; and it has no appraiser at all. My modesty prevented me from ever asking for one there.

Mr. KELLOGG. Detroit, Michigan, already has an appraiser, and that was the port I referred to; and when the gentleman says that the collections at Port Huron are more than at New Haven, Connecticut, he is mistaken by nearly $200,000, as the finance tables will show. The collections at Port Huron last year were only $73,077.12; at New Haven, Connecticut, they were $343,308.20. If the House should refuse to pass the bill I shall be obliged to ask for an appraiser at New Haven, and also one at Hartford, Connecticut, where such an officer is needed much more than at many of the places named in the bill, and perhaps as much as Port Huron.

Mr. CONGER. The appraiser at Detroit was appointed under a special act of Congress passed at the last session. The last Congress, on a full hearing, determined that such an officer was necessary there. Now, if the gentleman will yield one moment——

Mr. KELLOGG. I cannot yield longer now.

Mr. CONGER. Then I desire to say to the House that a manuscript bill which has never been printed, which comes before the House now for the first time, is to be forced through as a measure of civil-service reform without any opportunity for debate or examination. Is that the "civil-service reform" the gentleman from Connecticut would impose upon us? I commend him to the tender mercies of the House, which will decide whether a bill of this kind, unprinted and undiscussed, is to be put through in this manner.

Mr. KELLOGG. One word in reply to the gentleman from Michigan. I am not fearful of the "tender mercies of the House" on this question or any other, even if the gentleman from Michigan shall lead the onslaught.

I simply sought to do my duty in this matter. The bill referred to the committee was printed and has been before the House for three months. I gave notice in a speech I made March 11—more than a month ago—that we had agreed to report a bill to abolish these appraisers. The bill as reported simply leaves in some who were formerly embraced in the bill as referred and printed. We report a substitute abolishing appraisers at some ports, retaining only one at other ports. That is the whole of it. We retain some in the substitute reported that the original bill abolished.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question directly on the bill itself. Does he suppose that, abolishing the office of appraiser, the duties of appraiser will devolve on some other officer without some new provision of law?

Mr. KELLOGG. They certainly do devolve on the deputy collector or collector wherever there is one, as there is at most of these places——

Mr. KASSON. Without any new provision of law.

Mr. KELLOGG. Without any new provision of law whatever. They will devolve on the collector or deputy collector if there be a deputy collector, and if not on the collector. There is a deputy collector at all these ports, with the exception of two or three in the interior.

Mr. DAWES. Let me ask the gentleman a question, (for I desire to get whatever information I can on this point.) What collector has charge of the port of Evansville?

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman ought to know; for he made that a part of his speech, that it was useless to have any officer there, which attracted so much attention. There is a surveyor and other officers there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear this debate, but he cannot do it in consequence of the great confusion in the House.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am determined to have action on this bill if I can to-day, for I do not want to take another morning hour. I will yield to gentlemen to ask whatever reasonable questions they may have to put.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire in good faith, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman proposes to abolish several offices, as I understand it, and to provide that the duties hitherto discharged at these places by the present officers, who are to be abolished, shall be discharged by others. I do not know but my friend from Connecticut, like myself, represents a district where we do not have any of these offices. But I believe he wishes to convince the House that unless they abolish these offices he will be obliged to ask for the establishment of similar offices at Hartford and at New Haven.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And one at Salem, Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. And one at Salem, Massachusetts, for my friend, who is also on the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. I do not know how many there are in that position who are to have appraisers appointed unless this bill is passed. But I am going for the bill.

Mr. SENER. You are "going for" it; but how?

Mr. DAWES. I give notice rather than have new appraisers appointed at Hartford and at Salem and at Marblehead and at Lynn I shall go for abolishing these offices, whatever be the consequences or upon whomsoever shall fall afterward the discharge of these duties.

I am not against abolishing these offices. I rose merely to suggest to the gentleman that this was double work on the part of two committees. To be sure the Committee on Ways and Means have properly under the rules control of this question, but I do not desire to interpose one single obstacle in the way of the passage of this bill. I have no doubt it has received proper consideration by this committee. From the nature of their service, perhaps the Ways and Means Committee are best able to judge of the matter. The Committee on Civil Service brought in a bill yesterday (which went to the Committee of the Whole) to codify the whole customs service of the United States. I felt greatly relieved, and I said to the Committee on Ways and Means that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service had relieved us of a great work which had been of some trouble to us for two or three months; that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service had taken this off our hands. I give my friend from Connecticut therefore my hearty support in this bill, but I wish him to do himself and my colleague justice before the country and not have it said that the only condition upon which the people of the country can be saved from useless offices at Hartford, New Haven, Lynn, Marblehead, and Salem is to pass this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not yield any longer to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts, in reply, that an appraiser at New Haven or Hartford is needed much more than at the places in this bill where we propose to abolish them; but that if I should stand up to what I have said about this, in the same way in which he did in his former speech, I should strike out from the RECORD what I have said, as he did what he said in regard to his wishes to have such an officer in his district. For when commenting on the port of Evansville he uttered a feeling prayer, in that familiar style of his, that he wished he had a port of entry or delivery among the hills of Berkshire, Massachusetts, but when we came to read his speech in the RECORD, we found that he had struck out all that he had said on that subject.

Now I wish to say in regard to the action of the Committee on Ways and Means that we do not wish to antagonize with them at all. They would have done a good deal for the reorganization of the civil service if they had abolished many of the customs districts, as they ought to have done, under the lead of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts two years ago, instead of waiting until the special report came from the Treasury Department early during this session recommending the consolidation of customs districts. The gentleman then took up that report, and taking some eight or ten columns of figures out of the financial report, and from the Bureau of Statistics, he poured them over the heads of members here on this floor in that February speech of his. If the Committee on Ways and Means mean to get a bill through before the end of the session, we do not think there will be any suffering in any one of these places if we abolish these offices of appraisers now. Let them report a bill—and they have a right to report a bill at any time—and there will be no obstruction to it on the part of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, from which the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Ways Means, seeks on all occasions to pluck the few feathers it has. But it will do no sort of harm if we abolish those appraisers now, and then let the gentleman's committee give us a complete bill for the reform of the custom-house service.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] if he wishes to move the amendment he has indicated.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The amendment is now pending.

Mr. PARSONS. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not yield to the gentleman for that purpose now, but will in due time do so.

The question being taken on Mr. SCOFIELD's amendment to strike out "Philadelphia, Pennsylvania," from the bill, the House divided; and the Chair announced as the result of the vote that the noes had it.

Mr. MYERS. I must call for tellers. I do not think the question was understood. I do not think it is understood that this, perhaps unintentionally, would strike down one of the best officers of this Government; one who, during this session, has rendered great service, as my friend from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, will testify.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. MYERS. I will withdraw the request for tellers on the assurance of the gentleman from Connecticut, as I understand him, that no such proposition as I have stated is made. But I am afraid that would be the construction of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the gentleman is right and I am wrong I will help him to put it right hereafter.

Mr. MYERS. It would be better to have it right now.

Mr. KELLOGG. I now yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island to offer an amendment.

Mr. EAMES. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "Providence."

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES.]

Mr. EAMES. The bill before the House was suggested, beyond question, by a letter that was read by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the speech which he made early in February on the public expenditures. From that letter it appeared that a person who had once occupied the office of appraiser in some part of the country, not designated in the letter itself, had found that the only duties of his office were simply to receive and to receipt for the salary, which was fixed by law at the rate of $3,000.

When that letter was read, which also embraced the statement that there were about a dozen of these useless offices, the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, immediately corrected the statement by saying that there were sixteen of them. Now, I am unwilling on this floor or anywhere else to antagonize any reform that is proposed in regard to the civil service of the country. I should be unwilling if a place were pointed out where it appeared there was an officer who was drawing pay from the Treasury of the United States, and was not rendering an equivalent in service, to say a word in favor of maintaining such a useless office. But when the committee, in the consideration they have given to this question, come to the conclusion to include in this list the port of Providence, I cannot help feeling that they have acted upon information which is not correct.

Why, sir, there are in this bill some eleven ports that are designated, including the port of Providence. But outside of the ports named in this bill there are four ports which I can name at which these offices are established, not one of which returns to the Treasury of the United States from duties on imports anything like the amount that is returned to the Treasury of the United States from the custom-house at the port of Providence. I will name them: Detroit, in the State of Michigan; Charleston, South Carolina; Cincinnati, Ohio; and Savannah, Georgia.

Now, sir, so far as the port of Providence is concerned, I desire to make some statements in relation to it, which may justify the action I take in moving the amendment I have offered to exempt it from the provisions of this bill. The city of Providence, in an area of about three square miles, has by recent additions to its territory a population of about one hundred thousand. It is situated at the head of the navigation of Narragansett Bay, built beautifully on either side of the Providence River, and has within it almost every industry that you can name. During the past year there has been imported directly to this port, under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1870, at least $1,500,000 worth of merchandise subject to duties under the laws of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House, in relation to the necessity of an appraiser at the port of Providence, to some facts and statistics which I have gathered, and which have been furnished me since the first intimation was given to me that it was proposed to abolish the appraisership at that place. The port of Providence is the third of the New England ports as to the amount of revenue paid to the Government of the United States. It stands thirteenth on the list of all the ports of the country. The merchandise which has been imported directly by vessels into that port during the year ending June 30, 1873, consisting of coal, dye-woods, chemicals, iron and manufactures of iron, lumber, and other articles——

Mr. EAMES. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut to yield to me long enough to enable me to have read at the Clerk's desk a letter which I have just received from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield long enough to have the letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 14, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 11th instant, requesting information as to the extent of business at the custom-house at the port of Providence, State of Rhode Island, and to the propriety of discontinuing the services of the appraiser appointed under the act of July 14, 1870, I have to say that upon reference to the records in the office of the Commissioner of Customs it is ascertained that the duties on imports during the three years ending June 30, 1871, were $593,853.91, and that during the two years ending June 30, 1873, they amounted to $883,749.66.

Under these circumstances I do not feel warranted in recommending the discontinuance of the services of the appraiser until further trial.

I am, very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. B. T. EAMES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will submit the question to the House on the gentleman's speech and that letter whether they will accept the amendment or not, without further reply.

Mr. EAMES. It is hardly fair to take a member off the floor before he has stated the facts upon which he relies, and then submit the question to the House as if the statement had been made. But the House has heard the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to this port, and I have here the facts and figures which show that the port of Providence ought to be excepted from the provisions of this bill.

The value of the merchandise imported directly to this port during the year ending June 30, 1873, was $787,438. The value of merchandise rewarehoused for the same period was $218,736. The number of vessels entering the port from foreign countries during that year was 202, and the whole number of vessels from foreign and domestic ports was 7,126.

The value of merchandise imported under the act of July 14, 1870, from May 1, 1871, to April 30, 1872, was $75,776, on which the duties were $26,916; from May 1, 1872, to April 30, 1873, $154,138, on which the duties amounted to $47,249; from May 1, 1873, to December 31, 1873, a period of eight months, $121,018, and the duties $42,381, an increase over the corresponding months of 1872 of $34,572 in value and $12,882 in the amount of duties. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the duties on imports during the three years ending June 30, 1871, were $593,853.91, and that during the two years ending June 30, 1873, they amounted to $883,749.66. These facts indicate the amount of business and its rapid increase since the provisions of the act of July, 1870, were extended to the port of Providence. The amount of duties on imports in 1869 was $205,651.18, and in 1872, $530,129.70.

There are sixty merchants engaged in Providence in the importation of about one hundred and twenty five different kinds of merchandise.

The revenue derived from the port of Providence is very much larger than that received from the other ports at which the office of appraiser is proposed by the bill to be discontinued, and larger than that received from either of the four ports to which I have referred at which the office of appraiser is continued; and the number of persons employed and the cost of collection is less at Providence than at either of the last-named ports. The number of persons employed at Detroit is 59, and the cost of collection 19.27 per cent.; at Charleston, 41 persons, at a cost of 30.63 per cent.; at Savannah, 68 persons, at a cost of 42.25 per cent.; at Providence, 25 persons, at a cost of 8.52 per cent. Upon this statement, by what rule of equity is Providence deprived of an appraiser while an appraiser is retained at Detroit, Cincinnati, Charleston, and Savannah? I do not say that appraisers are not necessary at these ports, but if so, it is manifest that an appraiser ought to be retained at Providence. That such office is required at the port of Providence is evident from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and from the facts herein stated of the amount of its business as indicated by its revenue from imports.

The question was taken on Mr. EAMES's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] to offer an amendment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move to strike out "Norfolk, Virginia." I desire to call the attention of the members of this House to some facts which I want to present in reference to the proposition to take away this officer from the port of Norfolk.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not wish to antagonize a desire on the part of Congress to carry out a true and judicious system of economy; but I do not want the members of this House to vote without reason, without knowing what they are doing and without understanding the question before them. I do not want them to abolish an office when that abolition will be a detriment to the Government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a letter which I have received from one of the most experienced officers of the Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, NORFOLK, VIRGINIA.
Collector's Office, February 23, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Relative to the bill before Congress abolishing the position of appraiser at this and several other ports, I beg leave very respectfully to state that after careful reflection I am fully convinced that the abolishment of the appraiser's position at this port will be very detrimental to the public interest.

Should the act take effect, the duties now performed by the appraiser would revert to this office. Already with the increased trade of this port, and also in view of the fact that the Alexandria, Manassas and Orange Railroad will be shortly bonded under the act of July 14, 1870, through to Memphis, it will be a hard matter to keep up the work of this office without an increase of the force.

It is absolutely requisite that the duties of appraiser should be performed by some one separate and distinct from the collector's office, because in cases of appeals, the importer would have to await the decision of the general appraiser at Baltimore. Several days would elapse before that decision could be received. These delays would not only be annoying, but highly detrimental pecuniarily.

If it is contemplated to abolish the office as an economical measure, I think it will be a failure, because I am satisfied that a vigilant appraiser at this port can save for Government during the year fully twice the amount of his salary. In this connection I allude to the undervaluation of invoices.

I will also state that the "Allen line of steamers," from Liverpool, arrive at this port twice a month; they bring cargoes, not only for Richmond, Petersburgh, and Norfolk, but on several occasions for Memphis and Cincinnati by way of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. You will notice that these steamers alone furnish considerable work for the appraiser, and I have known, on a number of occasions, that the appraiser was kept so busy appraising goods that before he had completed the work of one steamer, another one arrived.

I earnestly hope, through your endeavors and influence, that the appraiser's position at this port will at least be retained.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. GETTSLICH.
Deputy Collector.

Hon. JAMES H. PLATT, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg the members of the House, before voting on this bill and on my amendment, to give me their attention for one moment. I desire to remind the House that the port of Norfolk is a sea-board port, and I believe the only one of that character which has been placed in this bill. Is is a port of entry for foreign goods and merchandise, not only for the city of Norfolk, but for the extensive system of navigable waters of which it is the central and entrance port. All the business done at the custom-houses at Petersburgh and Richmond is entered at Norfolk, and the returns for the last year show that the duties paid at those offices in gold amounted to $284,666.77 after all drawbacks had been settled by the Department.

Mr. KELLOGG. I believe the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. No, it has not. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Government might well afford to pay two or three times the amount of salary paid to this officer at this port. We are to have a weekly line of steamers connecting Norfolk with Europe, and there will be arrivals of foreign steamers every week. A grand trunk line of railroad is now completed from Norfolk to Bristol, Tennessee, which will carry more freight than any other line in the South, and which is about to become a bonded railroad. The Secretary of the Treasury and the very competent head of the custom-house department——

Mr. KELLOGG. I call the gentleman to order; his time has expired.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I want to know who keeps the time on this floor; the Speaker, or the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yielded only five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. And I wish to know if the five minutes have expired?

The SPEAKER. Not quite.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yielded to the gentleman five minutes, and it took three-fourths of his time to read that letter.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I was about saying that the Secretary of the Treasury and the head of the customs department, and everybody else excepting this Committee on Civil Service Reform, all unite in saying that the abolition of this office and the removal of this officer would be a detriment to the best interests of the Government of the United States. I ask the House not to strike this officer down and not to pass this bill without careful consideration and understanding the facts of the case.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would simply say in reply to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] that there were about $29,000 collected, which cost over $33,000 to collect, or 119 per cent.; and they had twenty-nine employés to do it. I think they ought to be satisfied with officers enough to take all the customs they collect and more also. I now call for a vote.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman allow me to move an amendment?

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PARSONS] wants to move to strike out "Cleveland." I allow that amendment to be offered, and I now call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The question was taken on seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 103, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELLOGG, and Mr. PLATT of Virginia, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 124, noes 24.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was then ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment to strike out "Norfolk, Virginia;" and being taken, it was not agreed to upon a division, ayes 31, noes not counted.

The next question was upon striking out "Cleveland, Ohio;" and being taken, it was not agreed to.

Mr. PARSONS. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and there were ayes 13, noes not counted.

Mr. PARSONS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; there being only 4 in the affirmative.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Is it in order to move to recommit this bill with the letters from the Secretary of the Treasury?

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order, the previous question being partly executed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to parliamentary inquiries at this time, or any other inquiries.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Have I a right to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. If it be a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. What became of the motion to recommit this bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. It was withdrawn, and I called the previous question.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. When was it withdrawn? I call for the record.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit must have been withdrawn before any amendment could be offered.

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman knows that I withdrew it, for he moved an amendment himself; and I withdrew it out of courtesy to him and other members who desired to offer amendments.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] promised that I should make a speech on the necessities of an appraiser at Cleveland, and he has not given me that privilege.

Mr. KELLOGG. I call for a vote. There was no time for a speech left in the hour.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the reading of the engrossed copy.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I will move to reconsider the last vote, and on that call the yeas and nays; so that the bill may be engrossed while the roll is being called.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw my call for the reading of the engrossed copy. I made it merely that the committee might have until to-morrow, when they would have another morning hour, to review this bill and make some corrections in it, which I am certain they would desire to make before passing it. That was my only object, and I withdraw my call.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLOGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the currency bill.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

Mr. CREAMER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 86) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the election of Senators of the United States by the people of the respective States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CONDEMNED ORDNANCE FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. WOODWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2980) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver to the Alliance Soldiers' Monument Association, of Alliance, Ohio, condemned ordnance for monumental purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES LANDS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. SENER. On Thursday last I introduced a bill releasing the claims of the United States to certain lands in the counties of Accomac and Northampton, in the State of Virginia, owned by the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws. I find that the whole subject is in the hands of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I ask that the reference of the bill be changed accordingly.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

MARY J. COATES.

Mr. CLAYTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2981) granting a pension to Mary J. Coates; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the compensation of the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall hereafter be the same as that paid the clerk of the Committee on Claims.

DEED-OF-TRUST SALES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHIPMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2982) relating to sales under deeds of trust in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The Chair will state the position of this bill. The first amendment pending is that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] which is an amendment to the original bill of the committee. The next amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.] There is also pending a substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] for the bill of the committee; and the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] has offered a substitute for that amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Upon the assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. MAYNARD] that after the bill of the committee shall have been voted upon he will go with the friends of the Senate bill to take it up, I withdraw my substitute; and I am also instructed to say that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] withdraws his amendment.

The SPEAKER. That would necessarily be withdrawn by the withdrawal of the proposition to which it is an amendment.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. With the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee I desire to modify the amendment I introduced the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify it, as the previous question is not yet operating.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] modifies his amendment, I beg to repeat what I said on a former day, that when the present bill shall have been disposed of by the House, it is my intention either myself to move to go to the Speaker's table, or to sustain such a movement on the part of any one else; and when the Senate bill shall be reached, should I obtain the floor, I shall move to put that bill on its passage, without amendment, and on the motion shall ask the previous question, so that the sense of the House may be promptly tested on that proposition.

I will say, further, that two gentlemen who have amendments pending, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] have intimated to me that they desire to modify their amendments before the House acts upon them. I think it fair and proper that those gentlemen should have that opportunity; I feel no disposition to deprive them of it. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] tells me that his colleague, Mr. STRAIT, who has been absent by reason of sickness, has sent to him an amendment, which, out of regard for an absent colleague who is sick, he desires to have read at the desk.

Mr. DUNNELL. I send to the Clerk the amendment which my colleague would have offered if he had been present and had obtained the opportunity.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill as new sections the following:

SEC. —. That if the amount of national-bank currency issued under this act shall exceed the sum of $400,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retire and cancel outstanding legal-tender notes to the amount of 50 per cent. of such excess until the amount of outstanding legal-tenders shall be reduced to $300,000,000; and if the amount of national bank-currency issued as aforesaid shall exceed $600,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to retire and cancel legal-tenders to the full amount of such excess until the amount of outstanding legal-tenders shall be reduced to $200,000,000.

SEC. —. That so much of the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent., as therein prescribed, shall apply to the extent of the legal-tender notes retired and canceled under the preceding section of this act.

Mr. MAYNARD. It will be seen that the principle of that proposed amendment is identical with that of the amendment already offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] and therefore I would decline to admit it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say one word to the gentleman from Tennessee. No opportunity has yet been given to vote upon a proposition to retire the national-bank paper and substitute in its stead United States notes, and also to release the banks from the obligation of holding a reserve in United States notes. I trust the gentleman will allow to be offered as a substitute for the bill a proposition which will accomplish that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. We voted on that question the other day.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have had no vote in the House upon that distinct question; it has always been coupled with other propositions.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I modify my amendment by striking out "September 1, 1874," in both places where that date is found, and inserting "July 4, 1876." I wish merely to say that, while I should prefer the earlier date, I have consented to this modification on the assurance of numerous members of the House that in this form the amendment will be more satisfactory to them.

Mr. FOSTER. I send to the Clerk my amendment in the form in which I have modified it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That whenever the national-bank note circulation shall exceed the aggregate of $400,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, so far as the fund hereinafter provided will permit, to retire, redeem, and cancel legal-tender notes of the United States to the extent of 25 per cent. of such excess until the outstanding and unpaid legal-tender notes of the United States shall be reduced to the amount of $300,000,000.

SEC. —. That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to perform the duty imposed by the preceding section, so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the funding and redemption thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, as relates to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States annually, and the setting the same apart as a sinking fund, be so amended that said purchase of 1 per cent. therein prescribed shall apply to the extent of the legal-tender notes of the United States directed to be retired, redeemed, and canceled under the preceding section of this act.

Mr. MAYNARD. Upon the bill and the two amendments now pending I move the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question be not sustained, will it be in order to offer a substitute proposing to retire the national-bank paper and substitute United States notes?

The SPEAKER. Of course it would be.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Tennessee, who has allowed all other forms of amendment to be presented, will allow such a substitute to be offered.

Mr. MAYNARD. That was the substance of a proposition which we voted on the other day.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was coupled with other matter.

On seconding the previous question the Speaker ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. HOLMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 114, noes 83.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] which will be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That from and after the 4th day of July, in the year 1876, nothing but gold and silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender for the payment of any debts thereafter contracted.

SEC. —. That from and after the 4th day of July, in the year 1876, every holder of United States notes shall have the right to exchange them at the Treasury of the United States in sums of $100, or any multiple thereof, for bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. a year, payable semi-annually; which bonds shall be redeemable after ten years from their date at the pleasure of the United States, and payable at thirty years from their date, payable, principal and interest, in gold; and the notes so exchanged shall be canceled and destroyed and not reissued, and no new notes shall be reissued in lieu thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 171, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Arthur, Barnum, Bass, Bromberg, Buffinton, Clayton, Clymer, Cox, Crooke, Curtis, Dawes, De Witt, Eames, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Joseph R. Hawley, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Hynes, Kellogg, Kendall, Lawson, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, MacDougall, Mitchell, Moore, Nesmith, Niles, Page, Hosea W. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—171.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Banning, Berry, Freeman Clarke, Crocker, Crossland, Elliott, Giddings, Glover, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Hersey, Hoskins, Howe, Lamar, Lawrence, Leach, Lynch, Morrison, Negley, O'Brien, Parsons, Purman, Ransier, Read, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sloan, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Standiford, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Walls, William B. Williams, Wilshire, and Wolfe—49.

So the amendment was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. GIDDINGS stated that he was paired with Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, who, if present, would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York, stated that he was paired on this and all kindred subjects with Mr. THORNBURGH, who would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, stated that he was paired with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, who would, if present, vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. BRADLEY stated that his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, was necessarily absent; but he could not state how he would vote, if present, on this question.

Mr. RAINEY stated that Mr. RANSIER, who was absent on account of illness, would, if present, vote in the negative.

Mr. LYNCH stated that he was paired with Mr. ELLIOTT, who would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. POLAND stated that his colleague, Mr. HENDEE, who was necessarily absent, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. FOSTER, as modified.

Mr. FOSTER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 103, nays 133, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Barber, Barnum, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Cannon, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crooke, Darrall, Dawes, DeWitt, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Farwell, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Robert S. Smith, Snyder, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Wallace, Walls, William B. Williams, Wolfe, and Woodford—54.

So the amendment was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. LYNCH stated that he was paired with Mr. ELLIOTT, who would if present vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, stated that he was paired with Mr. TOWNSEND, who would if present vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. BRADLEY stated that his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, who was necessarily absent would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOSKINS. May I inquire if this is the bill of the committee, with the seventh and eighth sections stricken out?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the previous question exhausted itself?

The SPEAKER. It has. If there be no objection the Chair will consider the previous question seconded and the main question ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I ask unanimous consent to have an amendment read.

Several members objected.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope there will be no objection to its being printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. POTTER's proposed amendment is as follows:

As an additional section at the end of the bill:
That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to resume the payment of the legal-tender Treasury notes of the Government in coin on the 1st day of January, 1876.

Mr. JEWETT. I also ask unanimous consent to have an amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. JEWETT's proposed amendment is as follows:

Insert at the end of section 4:
Provided, That for the circulating notes so withdrawn and canceled an equal and like amount of United States notes shall be issued and used by the Secretary of the Treasury in the purchase of United States bonds, which bonds, when so purchased, shall be retired and canceled.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and there were—yeas 129, nays 116, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, St. John, Stowell, Strawbridge, Tyner, Vance, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, William Wilshire, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—129.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Arthur, Atkins, Banning, Barnum Bass, Beck, Bland, Blount, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burleigh, Caldwell, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clymer, Comingo, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crooke, Danford, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Knapp, Lawson, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, MacDougall, McLean, Mellish, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Moore, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, O'Neill, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Randall, Read, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Small, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Starkweather, Stone, Swann, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Waldron, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, Woodford, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—116.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Barber, Berry, Freeman Clarke, Cook, Crocker, Crossland, Duell, Elliott, Giddings, Glover, Hendee, Hersey, Jewett, Lamar, Lamison, Lawrence, Leach, Lynch, McJunkin, Morrison, Negley, O'Brien, Purman, Ransier, James C. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sloan, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Waddell, Walls, William B. Williams, and Wolfe—45.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call, the following announcements were made:

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am paired with Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York. I am paired with Mr. THORNBURGH, of Tennessee. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I am paired with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. RAINEY. My colleague, Mr. RANSIER, is confined to his room by sickness. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. LYNCH. I am paired with Mr. ELLIOTT, of South Carolina. If he were here he would vote in the negative, and I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BRADLEY. My colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, is absent. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. LAMISON. I voted inadvertently and desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with Mr. NEGLEY, of Pennsylvania. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. LAMAR. I was out of the House on committee business and did not get back in time to give my vote. If here I should have voted "no."

The SPEAKER. Has the committee had leave to sit during the sessions of the House?

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir.

Mr. COX. I desire to state on behalf of Mr. STORM, of Pennsylvania, that he and Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, had paired in case they differed. Mr. YOUNG having voted "no," and Mr. STORM being of the same opinion on this question, I desire to state on his behalf that if he had been here he would have voted "no."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. CROCKER, who is detained by sickness, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. Mr. CROCKER would, if here, have voted "no," and Mr. SMITH "ay."

Mr. MARSHALL. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, is necessarily absent. If here he would vote in the negative.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I also move that the title of the bill do stand.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of certain railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands; and

A bill (S. No. 326) for the delivery to James B. Betts, receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States of America.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now move that the House proceed to consider business on the Speaker's table. I make that motion for the purpose of reaching the Senate bill in relation to currency and free banking.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 144, noes 42.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 27, not a sufficient number.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers on the yeas and nays there were ayes 22, not one-fifth of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are refused, the yeas and nays are refused, the motion is agreed to, and the House proceeds to consider business on the Speaker's table.

VETO MESSAGE—WILLIAM H. DENNISTON.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to herewith return to you, without my approval, House bill No. 1224, entitled "An act for the relief of William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant, Seventieth New York Volunteers," for reasons set forth in the accompanying letter of the Secretary of War.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, April 10, 1874.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the letter of the Secretary of War will be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose it would be in order to move to refer the message with the accompanying letter to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the letter.

The SPEAKER. The real principle of the veto is contained in the letter, and it would be proper to have it read.

The Clerk read the letter of the Secretary of War, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, April 8, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to return House bill No. 1224, "for the relief of William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers," with the remark that the name of William H. Denniston as an officer or private is not borne on any rolls of the Seventieth New York Volunteers on file in the Department. Of this fact the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives was informed by letter from the Adjutant-General's Office, dated December 19, 1873.

No vacancy existed in Company D (the company claimed) of this regiment for a second lieutenant during the period claimed, Second Lieutenant J. B. Ziegler having filled that position to May 2, 1862, and Second Lieutenant James Stevenson from that date to June 25, 1862. On regimental return for July, 1862, Edward Shields is reported promoted second lieutenant June 15, 1862.

There is no evidence in the Department that he actually served as a second lieutenant for the time covered by the bill herewith, and it is therefore respectfully recommended that the bill be returned to the House of Representatives without approval.

When the records of the War Department, prepared under laws and regulations having in view the establishment and preservation of data necessary to the protection of the public interests as well as that of the claimants, fail to show service, it is a subject of importance to legalize a claim wherein the Military Department of the Government has not seen the order under which the alleged service may have been claimed. A precedent of the kind is, beyond doubt, an injury to the public interest, and will tend to other special acts of relief under which thousands of muster-rolls certified at the date, under the Articles of War, as exhibiting the true state of the command will be invalidated, and large appropriations of money will be required to settle claims, the justness of which cannot always be determined at a date so remote from their origin.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. COBURN. I move that the message and accompanying letter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER, as the next business on the Speaker's table, laid before the House communications from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, claims for Indian depredations of the following parties: John J. North, Purcell & Echelberger, Sarah L. Mills, L. Valdez and F. P. Abren, C. R. Roberts, Aretus Whitcomb, H. A. Bateman, William Hewett, William F. Sutton, Thomas Callahan, and Thomas Lannon.

The communications were severally referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 1, 1820, a statement showing the appropriations for the military service for the preceding year, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. J. K. POLK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a letter from the commissioner of claims, transmitting, in compliance with the request of the House, papers and proof in the case of Mrs. J. K. Polk, widow of the late President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MILITIA FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 2, 1803, an abstract of the militia forces of the United States, according to the late returns; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

TREATY WITH CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, in relation to a treaty made with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, April 28, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 22, 1854, the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on the land grant to Juan de Vestas, a private land claim reported as No. 80; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING NATIONAL DEBT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of April 3, 1874, transmitting statements in relation to refunding the national debt; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of March 20, 1874, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1873, a report upon an examination of the waters for the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the Ohio River; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING OF MONEY BY THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1874.

SIR: In compliance with the direction contained in the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted on the 8th of January last, I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement of the amount of money refunded from the 4th of March, 1873, to the date of said resolution, on account of customs duty and internal taxes previously paid into the Treasury, the names of the persons to whom paid, and the amount to each respectively, and upon what articles the said refunds were made, together with a recital of the reasons for said payments, and the laws under which the same were made.

The total sum thus refunded on account of customs duty is $4,461,720.39, payments of which were made as follows:

Refunded directly from the Department on certified statements, for principal, interest, and costs	$1,822,740 75
From the port of New York, on account of excess of deposits and under the decisions of the Department	1,871,785 72
Of which amount there was refunded pursuant to the decisions of the Department $968,019.05; and on account of excess of deposits for unascertained duties $903,769.67.
From the port of Boston	187,873 38

In the statement from Boston it will be observed that no reasons are given for the refunds; but I understand that almost the entire amount thus refunded was excess of deposits found due on liquidation of entries.

From the port of Chicago	$114,463 10
From the port of New Orleans	64,553 04
From the port of Portland, Maine	2,582 28
From the port of Baltimore	42,777 53
From the port of Philadelphia	190,120 59
From the port of San Francisco	150,828 10

The Department has not yet received a detailed statement from the port of San Francisco, but does not deem it proper to further delay a compliance with said resolution in order to await its receipt. It will be duly forwarded as soon as received.

From the other ports, the details of which are presented in the accompanying statement	$13,995 90

It will be observed that the return from the port of Cincinnati fails to show the articles upon which refund was made.

In addition to these payments on account of customs duties there were refunded on account of internal taxes during said time	$282,271 62

The amount refunded during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, was $3,120,192.90, which covers a portion of the time embraced by this resolution. As the amount refunded since the 4th of March, 1873, is largely in excess of that refunded for the corresponding period of the preceding year, I deem it proper to say that during the period covered by this resolution large refunds have been made in consequence of the decisions of the courts made before and since said 4th of March upon cases which arose long prior to my advent into office, some of the suits dating back twenty years.

As a general rule the cases in which customs duties were refunded by this Department pursuant to the decisions referred to were covered by protests, appeals, and suits in the manner required by the fourteenth section of the act of Congress approved June 30, 1864; the sixteenth section of which act provides that "whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that in any case of unascertained duties, or duties or other moneys paid under protest and appeal, as hereinbefore provided, more money has been paid to the collector or person acting as such than the law requires should have been paid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to draw his warrant upon the Treasury in favor of the person or persons entitled to the overpayment, directing the said Treasurer to refund the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The reasons for the repayments will be found set forth at length in the several exhibits accompanying these documents, together with copies of the correspondence relative thereto and the opinions of the law officers of the Government upon the questions involved, where such opinions were given.

I am, very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The letter, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PERUVIAN STEAMSHIP RAYO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel.

The Senate amendment was to strike out the words at the end of the bill, "or other proper name;" so as to provide that the vessel should be registered by the name of The Star of the West.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

WHITE EARTH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table were Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land of the White Earth Indian reservation in Minnesota.

The amendments of the Senate were to change the name "Episcopal Board of Missions" to "Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States," and to amend the bill and title to correspond thereto.

Mr. AVERILL. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN RZIHA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, in the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out the preamble.

Mr. COBURN. I move the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

ALBERT ROSS.

The next business on the Speaker's table were amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1942) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Albert Ross to the active list of the Navy.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following: That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to order Master Albert Ross, now on the retired list, to duty on board of a cruising vessel of war, and to have duty pay and allowances; and if, at the expiration of one year's sea service, he is reported upon as physically qualified for promotion, to order him before the usual examining board for promotion, and, if he is found qualified, the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint him a lieutenant on the active list, next below Lieutenant Edwin S. Jacob: Provided, That he shall not receive any extra pay for the time he was on the retired list, and not on active duty, prior to his restoration under this act.

Also amend the title so that it will read:

A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to employ a retired officer at sea, and, if physically and professionally qualified to perform his duties, the President is authorized to restore him to the active list.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution; which was read, and, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That seventy-five hundred additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1873 be printed for the use of the institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

CURRENCY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall move to put that bill on its passage. In the first place, I ask that it be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to reserve all points of order upon the bill until it shall have been read.

The SPEAKER. Points of order are always good until the bill is read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

SEC. 2. That forty-six millions in notes for circulation in addition to such circulation now allowed by law shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter, and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870. And each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

Mr. G. F. HOAR and Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that this bill be put on its passage, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move that the House adjourn? It is not desirable that we should act on this bill hastily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] are both claiming the floor, as the Chair understands, upon points of order, which must be settled before the bill goes to a second and third reading.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make the point of order that this bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole under four different principles which have been settled by this House and are declared in the rules. In the first place, it is a bill to increase the public debt; and the Chair early in the session held that the rules of the House require such a bill to receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. Next, it is a bill which requires an appropriation of money, and comes within the rule on that subject as amended at the present session. Third, it is a bill amending several previous acts upon the same subject; and under the statement made by the Chair last Thursday in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] all the provisions in the acts to which this bill is an addition would themselves be germane amendments to this bill; and many of those provisions require appropriations of money and expressly make them. Fourth, the bill requires a tax upon the people. If the Chair will permit me to make a very short statement——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman fully.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I will not abuse the patience of the House or of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will gladly hear the gentleman.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The first section of this bill fixes the maximum amount of United States notes at $400,000,000. Now, it is true that it is claimed by some very respectable authorities that this is the amount authorized by existing law, while others claim that the existing law limits the amount to $356,000,000 or $382,000,000. But it is immaterial which of those claims is correct. By the vigor of this enactment, if the bill should become a law, what before was doubtful and unsettled will be settled, and the amount of this kind of indebtedness will be fixed at $400,000,000 by the force of a new law. More than that, it would clearly be a germane amendment to this section to strike out $400,000,000 and insert $500,000,000. In the second section, the bill requires distinctly an appropriation of money—not a large one it is true, but sufficient to bring it within the principle of the rule; for an expenditure of even $100 must first be considered in the Committee of the Whole. These $46,000,000 of notes for circulation are to be issued to national banking associations and paid for from the United States Treasury; and the money for this expenditure, if the bill takes effect, is required to be appropriated. It is true that under the previous law the United States Treasury will some time be reimbursed for this expenditure by a tax on the circulation of these banks; but it would be perfectly competent for the House, by an amendment, to strike out that provision for reimbursement. The Chair has several times during the present session held, and the House has agreed, that a proposition for a sale of land, although it is to be sold for its full cash value, is a proposition to appropriate property of the United States. A proposition therefore to advance from the Treasury of the United States the cost of supplying these banks with notes is liable to the point of order, although it may be provided that the United States shall be reimbursed by a tax on a certain species of property, if the latter provision should not be struck out by an amendment, as it may be. In the next place, the fact that this second section requires a tax upon the people brings it within the express provision of the one hundred and tenth rule of the House; and for this reason also it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

But further, Mr. Speaker, this bill, although not entitled an amendment to the original statute of 1862 and the various subsequent statutes on the subject, refers to one of them in its second section for its construction and enforcement; and manifestly every sentence of it requires a reference to those previous acts in order to explain its meaning and to supply the mechanism by which it is to go into effect. Each one of those acts contains an express appropriation of money from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of enabling the act to be carried into effect. Now certainly it would be competent to move to this bill an amendment providing that the $46,000,000 of notes to be provided by the United States should be paid for from the Treasury in some different way or by a tax on some different class of property, or should be paid for from the Treasury without reimbursement. For all these reasons it seems to me that this bill is liable to the point of order. Nothing is to be gained by repeating my statements if I have made my points understood by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appreciates the gentleman's points.

Mr. GARFIELD. Most of what I desired to say has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR;] but I wish to call special attention to a point which I believe he has not mentioned.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to know whether this point of order is subject to debate and illustration?

The SPEAKER. The rules permit a brief explanation of a point of order. The gentleman will doubtless keep within proper limits.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call attention to the language of the rule, on page 70 of the Digest:

> No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day on which it is made or offered; and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in the Committee of the Whole.

It was ruled the other day by the Chair, concerning this very bill, it was not pending and would not be pending until it was reached on the Speaker's table. Therefore this bill, this measure, is now offered to the House for the first time.

I claim, therefore, under that provision of the rule, it cannot be considered to-day That is the first point I make. In the second place I claim that it is a charge upon the people. It provides for issuing a class of obligations, to pay every one of which obligations by its very term is a charge upon the people.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman refer to the first section?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do. And that charge is in the nature of taxation, no matter whether it be in the form of a promise to pay with or without interest; for I could, without any impropriety, move so to amend the first section that they should be interest-bearing Treasury notes. Certainly the Speaker could not rule such an amendment out of order as not being germane. I might move as a substitute that interest-bearing notes should be issued instead of the ordinary legal-tender notes. Nobody could then doubt that in such a form it would be a charge upon the people.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Speaker, this is in fact and in reality a charge upon the people, and comes under the very wise arrangement of the rules that all such charges upon the people must have a day to wait after they are offered. On that ground it cannot be offered to-day. In the next place, it must go to the Committee of the Whole, where the whole subject of a money bill must be considered under the rules governing that committee. I have no doubt an amendment providing for paying these notes hereafter would be entirely germane.

I make these points, Mr. Speaker, not because of any desire to delay or antagonize the consideration of this bill, but because I am desirous the House shall keep itself within the old safe usage of careful rulings in relation to money bills.

The SPEAKER. It is quite possible that the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] and by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] against this bill would be good if it were a House bill, regularly reported from a House committee. If it lays "a tax or charge upon the people" in any form, or proposes in any way to raise revenue, it must, as a House bill, have its first discussion in Committee of the Whole. But the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Ohio will both observe that the bill comes to us from the Senate, and if it be open to the objection urged, the Senate could not have constitutionally originated it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then let us make that point.

The SPEAKER. That point, the gentleman from Ohio will observe, is one which the Chair has never ruled upon, because it is not for the Chair to say what the Senate of the United States may or may not properly do. On all points where the House has disagreed from the Senate on matters affecting its privilege and prerogative it has been by vote of the House. If the House therefore agrees that the Senate of the United States sends this bill here properly, then all the points made by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Massachusetts must necessarily fall, because the House cannot concede that the Senate originated this bill properly and sent it here properly, and then ask the Chair to rule that it is a tax bill and must go to the Committee of the Whole for its first discussion. A tax bill or any bill for raising revenue must originate in the House, and it would be a singular presumption on the part of the Chair to declare that the Senate had transcended its power in any given case.

Mr. GARFIELD. At this point let me suggest that the House may waive its right in that particular.

The SPEAKER. The House cannot with propriety waive on the grave question of prerogative as between the two branches and then ask the Speaker to enforce a subordinate technical rule as to the mere mode of discussing a bill. This would certainly be a most serious disregard of the weightier matters of the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course we must raise that, but if we do not——

The SPEAKER. If they do not raise it the Chair is bound to presume—he cannot have any other presumption—that the House regards the bill as properly here.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I raise the question.

The SPEAKER. That it is not properly here?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do raise the question that this bill is not properly here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio raises the question that this bill is not properly here, and that question must be disposed of at once.

Mr. RANDALL. What becomes of the other points raised by the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. If the bill is not properly here the other points are not before the House for the Chair to rule upon. The gentleman from Ohio now raises the point that this bill be returned to the Senate of the United States because it is not properly here, the Senate having no power under the Constitution to originate any such bill. The Chair will put that question to the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 145.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays.

While the question on ordering the yeas and nays was being put,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I desire to say a word——

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this question not debatable?

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing, and the Chair thinks that in consenting to a division the gentleman waived the right of discussion.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 36, noes 139.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now desire to say a word.

Mr. RANDALL. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that except by unanimous consent debate is not in order.

Several members objected, and demanded the regular order.

Mr. GARFIELD. There can hardly be a higher question debated in this House.

Several members objected to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to limit discussion; but he will remark that the gentleman from Ohio made his point and submitted the question, and by his consent a vote was taken upon it. That was a yielding of the floor for the decision of the House; and it is not competent for the Chair, except by consent, to interrupt the giving of that decision.

Mr. GARFIELD. The previous question has not been ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask for a division by tellers.

Mr. GARFIELD. As the previous question has not been ordered, I do not see how debate is shut off.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will not contend that, during a division of the House, he can debate the question. The House is now engaged in perfecting the process of that division. The gentleman from Ohio made his point, debated it, and took his seat. The Chair put the question, and the House not being satisfied with the viva voce vote, the division was called for. Now a further process of certification of the division, by calling the yeas and nays, has been ordered. All these steps are certifications of the vote, and there is no point between them where the gentleman can stop the process and initiate debate. The result is the same as if the previous question had been ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. If gentlemen are not willing to debate so grave a question as this——

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I object to debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered; and I desire to say a word on that.

The SPEAKER. That is not debatable, of course.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw that motion, then, if gentlemen are unwilling to debate the question.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I renew it.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the yeas and nays were ordered, there were ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the House refused to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the Chair again state the question?

The SPEAKER. The question is this: The motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is that this bill did not properly originate in the Senate, being a bill levying a tax and charge upon the people and that the House shall so declare, and instruct the Clerk to return it to the Senate with that message. Those in favor of so declaring and so instructing the Clerk of the House will say "ay," and those of the contrary opinion will say "no."

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Did I understand the Chair aright, as saying that if this bill had originated in the House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot go into that. The Chair is merely stating what the House is to vote on.

Mr. SPEER. I understand that tellers had been asked.

The SPEAKER. Objection was made.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Would a motion to lay this business on the table be now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, on a question of this kind.

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Barnum, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Clayton, Clymer, Cox, Creamer, Crooke, Dawes, DeWitt, Eames, Eldredge, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Joseph R. Hawley, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, St. John, Stowell, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—179.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Barry, Berry, Burchard, Cain, Freeman Clarke, Crocker, Elliott, Freeman, Glover, Hendee, Hersey, Hooper, Kelley, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Leach, Luttrell, Maynard, Moore, Morrison, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, O'Brien, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, James C. Robinson, Henry J. Scudder, Sloan, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Sprague, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, and Wolfe—55.

So the House refused to declare that the bill did not properly originate in the Senate.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to insist on the point of order made by me, that this bill requires an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Under the ruling of the House, of course, the Chair cannot sustain the point of order that the bill is a revenue bill, and therefore overrules it. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the further point of order that the bill contains an appropriation of money.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Requires an appropriation of money.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill, and the Chair begs the attention of the House to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

SEC. 2. That forty-six millions in notes for circulation in addition to such circulation now allowed by law shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter, and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870. And each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

The SPEAKER. The appropriation to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers is the expenditure which the Treasury Department may be called upon to make in order to furnish the dies, stamps, and notes for the circulation authorized by this bill. The Chair, as bearing upon that point, directs the Clerk to read a part of the forty-first section of the original banking act, which is still in force.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the plates and special dies to be procured by the Comptroller of the Currency for printing such circulating notes shall remain under his control and direction, and the expenses necessarily incurred in executing the provisions of this act respecting the procuring of such notes, and all other expenses of the Bureau, shall be paid out of the taxes or duties now or hereafter to be assessed on the circulation and collected from the associations organized under this act.

The SPEAKER. The working of this bill would be that under the law it would impose a tax upon the circulation guaranteed of $460,000, nearly a half million of dollars, 1 per cent. upon the circulation, and a small proportion of that amount, not exceeding one-tenth of it, would have to be paid out to supply the dies and stamps and notes. The Chair ruled in the case of the Utah bill, which created some observation in the House, that if the officers authorized by that bill were paid by fees, if the operation of the law, in other words, paid for itself and did not call upon the Treasury of the United States for any expenditure, it would not be liable to the point of order.

The Chair has further ruled that an appropriation of money given to an assay office to purchase bullion for coinage, by which an old dollar might be exchanged for a new one, was not liable to the point of order; that within the fair meaning of the rule it did not involve an appropriation of money; that it did not in any way, direct or indirect, remote or immediate, call for an expenditure of public money in any proper sense of that word.

Now in this case the Chair thinks that most obviously no expenditure is called for. The Chair apprehends the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and understands the line of his argument, but it seems to the Chair that it would be a very extreme construction of the rule to maintain that a bill which by the one hand supplied to the Treasury $460,000 annually, and by the other required a possible expenditure in the very first year of forty or fifty thousand dollars, is amenable to the point of order that it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole in order that the people's money may be protected by a free discussion on bills of appropriation. This, it seems to the Chair, would be a very extreme construction of the rule, and one that might justly bring the rule itself, valuable as it is, into odium.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the Chair allow me to inquire whether a bill establishing an assessor, and simply providing that he shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, even if it requires him to assess $100,000,000, would not be liable to the point of order as an original expenditure by the Government? Could we not by a germane amendment strike out the provision for reimbursing the United States for this expense by a tax on the circulation?

The SPEAKER. That might change the tax bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. No; I mean in this bill.

The SPEAKER. By an amendment you might change the effect of the tax, but that would not come under this point of order; it would apply to the point of order already settled by the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is not my point. The point that the Chair is discussing is, that the bill requires the United States to pay out in the first instance the cost of printing forty-six millions of national-bank notes, for which it is true the United States is to be afterward, as the law now stands, reimbursed by a tax on the bank circulation; but that tax may be stricken out of the bill by a germane amendment leaving the requisition for an appropriation of money from the Treasury, and making no provision for subsequent reimbursement.

The SPEAKER. On the same principle, the bill in regard to the assay office might have been amended by saying that they should pay an old dollar for a new half-dollar.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is merely changing the form. The Chair has held that a bill authorizing lands to be sold at auction is a bill appropriating money of the United States.

The SPEAKER. O, certainly, certainly; but the Chair does not see the analogy to this case, and he cannot sustain the point of order.

Mr. COX. Will the Chair allow me to ask whether it would be germane to this bill to move to so amend it as to change the banking law, and place the tax for the whole manufacture of these bank-notes upon the people, and not upon the banks? Would it be in order to move such an amendment to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would want to look at the bill before he would consider such an amendment in order.

Mr. COX. If such an amendment could be made——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it could not be made to this bill, because this bill does not connect itself with the preceding bank acts in that sense, while the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency distinctly states in its title that it is a bill supplemental to, and amendatory of, the preceding acts, and thus brought those acts within the purview of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. WOODFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether an amendment to this bill, appropriating $50,000 for the expense of issuing the additional United States notes provided by the first section of this bill, would be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WOODFORD. I desire to remind the Chair that every one of the original six bills providing for the United States currency contained within them direct and specific sections providing in direct terms money to pay the expense of the issue of the notes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am sorry to object, but that is debate, and not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see the relevancy of the inquiry.

Mr. WOODFORD. Is not this first section amendatory of the entire line of laws which have provided for the issue of United States notes?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] is confounding the bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency with the Senate bill.

Mr. WOODFORD. The Senate bill embraces both subjects, United States Treasury notes and bank currency; the one in the first section of the bill, and the other in the second section.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a point of order. I would have made it before, except that I thought we were getting to an end of this matter. My point of order is that all possible amendments which may be offered hereafter do not constitute subjects of parliamentary inquiry pending the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair thinks.

Mr. KASSON. It is putting conundrums to the Chair, to which I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot be called upon to rule upon an amendment until it is offered. If an amendment is offered the Chair will rule upon it. But the possibility of an amendment is not a strict subject for ruling; and the Chair has frequently requested that he shall not be called upon to make hypothetical rulings.

The question was then taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 121, noes 59.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope not; let the yeas and nays be taken upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being only 19 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of the last vote.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 102, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Hagans, Harmer, Henry R Harris, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodford—102.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Barry, Berry, Cain, Freeman Clarke, Crocker, Duell, Elliott, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hersey, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Luttrell, Lynch, Morrison, Negley, Nesmith, O'Brien, Ransier, James C. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sloan, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Waddell, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, William B. Williams, Wolfe, and John D. Young—48.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am paired with Mr. BARRY, of Mississippi. If present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am paired with Mr. J. AMBLER SMITH, who if present would vote "ay," and I "no."

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky. I am paired with Mr. STORM, of Pennsylvania. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. E. R. HOAR. My colleague, Mr. CROCKER, is detained from the House by sickness; if here he would vote "no."

Mr. AVERILL. My colleague, Mr. STRAIT, is absent on account of sickness; if here he would vote "ay."

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York. I am paired with Mr. THORNBURGH, of Tennessee. If present he would vote "ay," and I "no."

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. TOWNSEND, who if present would vote in the negative, while I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey. I am paired on this question with my colleague from New Jersey, Mr. WARD. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to announce that I am paired upon this bill with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. ELLIOTT, who if present would vote in the negative, while I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PURMAN. My colleague, Mr. WALLS, is absent on account of sickness. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. BURCHARD. On this bill the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SMITH, is paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CROCKER, who if present would vote "no," while Mr. SMITH would vote "ay."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My colleague, Mr. HERSEY, is absent on account of illness. If he were present he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. EMILY MILLER.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mrs. Emily Miller, and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I give notice that to-morrow, at the close of the morning hour, I shall call up the legislative appropriation bill.

RETIRED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2983) to put retired officers of the Army on duty; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of House bill No. 2978, entitled "A bill for the reorganization of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," be printed for the use of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots;

An act (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels; and

An act (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rules, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Hugh McCullough, of Cincinnati, Ohio, for a dependent father's pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 15, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain of the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, in the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels;

A bill (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land of the White Earth Indian reservation in Minnesota;

A bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots;

A bill (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;" and

A bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873—to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States.

The bill (H. R. No. 2425) to provide for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of newspapers by mail within the county where published—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 2899) revising and embodying all the laws authorizing post-roads in force on the 1st day of December, 1873—to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States.

The bill (H. R. No. 2979) abolishing the office of appraiser of imported merchandise, appointed under the act of July 14, 1870, and acts amendatory thereof, at certain places—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Public Lands have reported a bill identically like that; and if the Senate would consent, I should like to have it considered and passed now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the House bill be laid aside until we get through with the morning business.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of William R. Brown, of Metropolis, Massac County, Illinois, praying the payment of the proceeds of certain cotton, amounting to $38,000; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of the Zoological Society of Philadelphia, praying that importations of animals for that society, which are to be used solely for recreative and scientific purposes and not in anywise for pecuniary profit, may be exempt from the payment of duties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the petition of Arthur Connell, of Houston, Texas, with accompanying papers, praying relief in the matter of rents received by the United States from his property in the city of Memphis, Tennessee, and appropriated for public use; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCHURZ presented additional papers pertaining to the application of Sarah E. Ballantine, of Boonville, Missouri, praying compensation for property destroyed by order of General Lyon; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of the Buffalo Board of Trade, in favor of the removal of the obstructions in the Saginaw River, at Carrolton bar; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Mary Jane Loonie, widow of James A. Loonie, late of the Eighty-eighth New York Volunteers, praying a modification of the pension laws so as to allow her to contract and pay such fees as she thinks proper; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Jesse Warren and Joseph A. Moore, asking compensation for a building taken for the use of the Army, near Nashville, Tennessee, have instructed me to report a bill for their relief. We adopt in this case a report made at a previous session, which has been printed. I do not therefore ask for the printing of the report.

The bill (S. No. 701) for the relief of Warren & Moore, Nashville, Tennessee, was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims instructed me to report back the petition of G. A. Henderson, praying payment of his salary as a clerk in the Treasury Department while suspended by order of the Secretary from January 28, 1864, to May 18, 1865, with the recommendation that it ought not to be allowed. I move the adoption of the report, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Frederic A. Holden, praying for remuneration for property destroyed in Ceredo, Wayne County, West Virginia, by United States soldiers during the late rebellion, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Ellen Call Long, praying for payment of the claim of the heirs of Richard K. Call in accordance with a judgment of the United States court of Florida, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 113) for relief of the trustees of Wildey Lodge, Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 702) for the relief of Marie P. Evans, executrix and legatee of S. Duncan Linton, deceased, and to refer her claim to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 703) authorizing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to revise and adjust the accounts of James C. Pickett as chargé d'affaires to Peru; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 704) for the relief of the officers and men of the United States Army who were sufferers by the wreck of the bark Forrest; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FENTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 705) to extend letters-patent to Henry G. Bulkley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 706) to amend an act approved July 17, 1862, entitled "An act for the better government of the Navy of the United States;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOREMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 707) to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BOGY. I move that Senate bill No. 32 be taken up. It is a very important bill, I will state to the Senate.

Mr. PRATT. I object. I am very desirous of having the Calendar called. The morning hour was taken up yesterday in the consideration of a special bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri makes his motion; and the bill will be read for information, after which the question will be submitted to the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by the Committee on Private Land Claims as a substitute for the bill (S. No. 32) obviating the necessity of issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What committee reported that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the 3d of March.

Mr. BOGY. I will state for the information of the Senate that this bill was reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims unanimously, and has also received the approbation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and it involves no appropriation or donation of land. The only object is to do away with the necessity of issuing patents; and the necessity for it grows out of a decision of the Supreme Court, made recently, to the effect that our statute of limitations does not begin to run until the patent issues. That decision is not in accordance with the legal opinion of the bar of my State for the last forty years; and patents in very few cases have been issued, we deeming that the confirmation was sufficient and had passed the entire title of the United States. Under the decision of the Supreme Court, as long as the nominal legal title remains in the Government, the limitation provided by the law of the State does not begin to run. The consequence is that a very wide field of litigation is thereby opened. The object of this bill is to close that field of litigation. It involves no appropriation, or donation, or grant of land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator from Missouri would let this bill go over until to-morrow. I think it ought to lie over. I think Senators ought to investigate it. I am bound to say for one, if it is of any advantage to the Supreme Court that I should say so, that I think they decided the question to which the Senator refers correctly, because it is a well-understood principle of jurisprudence that the statute of limitations does not run against the Government, and until the patent issues the title is in the Government, and therefore no adverse occupation could oust that title.

But now this bill seems to provide—of course we cannot at present discuss its merits, and it may be that I misunderstand its provisions, having just heard them read for the first time—that any occupant adverse to the United States shall have the benefit of the effect of the statute of limitations as between private persons, and we release to him any equity that would have been his had our title been a private one in every case in which any officer of the Government under a statute, whether in conformity with it or not, has taken a step which seemed to indicate that the man had or was about to have a title.

It may be that I misunderstand its provisions. It needs careful examination. I hardly suppose that the honorable Senator desires to go that far, because if he does it would in effect be declaring that every adverse occupant who claimed against the United States under a color of title, however defective and unfounded it might be in point of law or in point of merit, should have the statute of limitations operate in his favor against the United States, to the great injury of the public revenues it may be. But it may be that it does not bear that construction. Of course I cannot discuss it on this motion. I want to say to the honorable Senator that I wish it might go over until to-morrow that I may have an opportunity to look at it.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Vermont misunderstands the purport of the bill.

Mr. PRATT. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana will state his point of order.

Mr. PRATT. The point of order is that when the Senator from Missouri asked that the bill might be taken up in the morning hour I objected; and the Chair ruled that the bill should be read for the information of the Senate. It has been read. I now renew my objection. I dare say the bill is all right; I make no opposition to it; but it is a bill on the Calendar, and there are a great many like bills on the Calendar that deserve consideration just as much as the one now presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri made a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill and therefore a single objection did not defeat it. The Chair ordered the bill to be read for information, and said to the Senator from Indiana that the Chair would then submit the question to the Senate. Thereupon the Senator from Missouri made a certain statement as to the nature of the bill and the Senator from Vermont asked a certain question. The pending question now is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill? which is subject to debate, limited by the rule that the merits shall not be discussed.

Mr. BOGY. I will relieve the Senator from Indiana of any trouble on that subject. The Senator from Vermont desires to examine the bill, and I have no objection to giving him time to do so. I shall call up the bill to-morrow morning. I withdraw the motion now.

DISTRICT PUBLIC-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2550) making appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PRATT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BOREMAN. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. ROBERTSON] has gone home for a few days, and before going he wished me to say that he desired to speak to this bill and would be glad that it should be laid over until his return. He will be back in three or four days, I presume. I make this statement at his request.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to state that there is a pressing necessity for the passage of this bill. There is great destitution among the teachers. The taxes which were intended for their payment have been appropriated for other purposes, and many of them are in a starving condition. The Senator from South Carolina objected to the bill in committee, but I do not think he would press his objection on more full consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I really think something ought to be done with this bill. It ought not to be delayed. I do not know that it is in precisely the shape in which it ought to pass; but at all events it seems to me that we ought not to shirk the consideration of the question. I trust we will take it up and consider it this morning.

Mr. BOREMAN. I do not wish to be understood as objecting to the bill myself. I am yielding to the request of my friend who has gone home. I have discharged that duty.

Mr. CONKLING. How long will he be gone.

Mr. BOREMAN. A short time.

Mr. CONKLING. Two or three weeks?

Mr. BOREMAN. I think not. I think he will be back in a few days.

Mr. CONKLING. I hear a Senator on my left say that the absent Senator is likely to be gone two or three weeks. If that be so, or anything like it, I think the Senator from West Virginia cannot base his interposition upon the ground of courtesy. The Senator from Vermont has said what I should have said if he had not spoken. It seems to me, without speaking of the particular form or effect of the present bill, as to which I am not advised, that it is manifestly our duty to dispose of this question in some way or other and not to allow it to stand for two or three weeks unless for some very special reason such as I think has not been assigned. There is a great injustice, a great hardship, and a great dereliction of duty somewhere involved in the existing state of facts as they are given to me. If this bill is not the proper measure, let us dispose of it and vote it down and have some measure that is, and if it shall turn out that there is no action incumbent upon us when we consider it, we shall stand acquitted of our duty; but I submit that we ought, and ought now as the motion is made, to take up this subject and consider it and dispose of it one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2550) making appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same.

The bill appropriates $97,740.50, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia from the 1st day of September, 1873, to the 1st day of March, 1874; and authorizes and directs the government of the District of Columbia to levy and collect a tax to an amount equal to the amount appropriated in the act, upon personal property, including banks and other corporations in the District, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States. The money hereby appropriated is to be disbursed under the supervision of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. THURMAN. These teachers have been unpaid from the 1st of last September, if my memory is correct. Under the law as it now stands, the real-estate owners of the District of Columbia defray the entire expenses of the public schools, although a large portion of the children who attend those schools are children of the employés of the Government who own no property whatsoever in this city.

This bill proposes to advance out of the Treasury of the United States a sufficient sum to pay those teachers, the Treasury to be reimbursed by a tax on the personal property within the District. My own judgment is that when this matter shall come to be properly investigated, it will be no more than just that the General Government, which has never contributed anything in lands or money for purposes of common-school education in the District, should bear some portion of the burdens of those schools. This bill, however, does not provide for the Government of the United States bearing any such portion of the burden, but simply to advance a certain amount of money to be reimbursed to the United States to relieve the present necessity. It is a very weak measure indeed; I would go for a stronger measure.

Mr. SHERMAN. Strike out that portion of the bill which provides for levying a tax.

Mr. THURMAN. No, I think it is best not to amend the bill. I have only to say that it does not go as far as I am willing to go in favor of common schools in the District. I can vote for the bill, however, although I do not think it goes far enough.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not rise to oppose the bill. I am in favor of making the appropriation; but there is a difficulty in reference to the practical operation of the bill. Heretofore, as I am informed, there has never been any system by which personal property has been assessed and taxed in this District. This bill proposes, therefore, to start an entirely new system of taxation by which this $97,000 shall be raised. I do not know whether there are any data upon which the District government can act to carry this bill into practical effect. I know of no assessment that has been made of personal property that can be reached practically. I merely suggest this point without offering anything by way of amendment.

Mr. SPENCER. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that the Committee on the District of Columbia have referred that matter to a sub-committee, and they are preparing a bill in reference to a future taxation for school purposes which will obviate the necessity of such a bill as this coming before Congress again.

Mr. THURMAN. There is the trouble suggested by the Senator from Vermont. Since the present government of this District has been inaugurated an assessment of personal property has been made with a view to taxation. It cost I think, according to the testimony that has been given before the investigating committee, something like $40,000 to take that assessment. No tax has ever been levied under it; but the taxes of this District are levied wholly upon real estate, according to the idea of some political economists that nothing but real estate ought to be taxed and that personal property ought to be wholly exempt from taxation. This District is the only place in the United States that I know of in which that theory of political economy prevails.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The theory prevails, I will inform the Senator from Ohio, in New York. They have a gentleman there who has promulgated the theory and enforces it, and with the idea that it is to become the universal practice of civilized nations. I refer to David A. Wells.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not propose to discuss that question. It is a very great question. I think, however, it will be found that in New York there is some taxation of personalty; but I am not sure how that is, and I do not want to go into it.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to decline the honor which the Senator from Vermont is disposed to confer on New York. The gentleman he refers to is a Connecticut man, a man of great learning, but I did not know that he had enforced his views in New York. He has published them to the world; and as everybody in New York reads everything, of course his views have been read in that State.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. Let me suggest to the Senator that we have been informed very often on this floor that political economy was an exact science, a thing about which there could be no mistake.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say so, and so the Senator had no occasion to interrupt me with such a smart remark. I desire that when my friend from Indiana wants to air his logic or have a tilt with any one he throw down his gauntlet to the man who had given the challenge, not to me. I think we have had sufficient evidence in the Senate, where there have been so many political economists, that all sorts of theories of political economy can obtain even in the Senate of the United States, and some of them very strange notions too.

Mr. MORTON. Yes; I have heard a good many myself.

Mr. THURMAN. But, sir, that is not the thing. There is the difficulty that the Senator from Vermont speaks of. An assessment of personal property will become necessary in order to execute this law; but the money that this bill advances can be paid, and, as is suggested by the Senator from Alabama, a law can then be passed to provide for executing the other part of the bill, which will create the machinery.

Mr. STOCKTON. I voted to take this bill up for the reasons given by the Senator from New York. I am entirely in favor of Congress advancing the money at present to pay the teachers of the District schools, but there is a provision in the bill which the committee who reported the bill have not explained. I am told—not being upon the committee, of course I do not know it to be true—that a tax has been levied for this purpose on the real estate of the District. And now the proposition is made that the Government of the United States shall advance this money out of the Treasury, and a clause is put in the bill that the Government is to be reimbursed through a tax on personal property in the District. That involves another question besides that which has been raised, as to whether we should tax personal property or not. If you have taxed an owner of real property for this purpose and that tax has not been collected, then to ask the Government of the United States to advance this money and in the same bill order that the tax be levied on personal property, when the other tax has not been collected which was to cover this sum, may be a very bungling way of doing it. I do not know whether the statement I have made is correct, but I am told it is; and I submit that while I am in favor of this bill so far as the appropriation by Congress is concerned, and while I may be in favor of the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio that Congress itself should do something toward the schools in this District, yet at the same time it ought to be made clear by some written report or by some direct and positive statement from this committee what is the meaning of the clause relative to an assessment on personal property. I should like to have the question answered whether a tax for this purpose has been heretofore levied on the real estate of the District and whether it ever has been collected.

Mr. SPENCER. In answer to the Senator from New Jersey I desire to state that this bill originated in the House of Representatives in order to relieve the pressing necessities of the teachers of the public schools of the District of Columbia. Our committee concluded not to amend this bill; but we referred the subject of taxation to a subcommittee, and they are now preparing a bill to obviate the objections the Senator has suggested. A tax was levied for this purpose, and I suppose collected, but owing to the laxity of the law the money has been misappropriated. These school-teachers are in a suffering condition.

Mr. STOCKTON. The Senator need not enlarge upon that. I presume that fact is known to every Senator; I have heard no Senator deny it. Therefore it is not necessary to enlarge on the condition of the school-teachers; nor do I think it is necessary to enlarge on the fact that we ought to go forward and grant this money. But I think that the better way to carry the object of this bill speedily into effect is to strike out that portion of the bill authorizing a tax to be levied, when it is admitted that a tax for this purpose has been already levied and perhaps collected. Some provision might be made leaving it in our power to direct a tax to be levied on personal or real property hereafter to reimburse this advance or to take such other course as we may think best hereafter. But to pass a bill levying a certain tax on personal property now is unequal and unfair; for you will see that, when the owner of real and personal property has had this tax already levied upon him on his real property, if now you tax that owner on his personal property alone you tax him a second time. It is inconsiderate to levy this tax without some explanation or understanding of what its effect is to be. It is no doubt creditable to the committee that they desire to get through this bill to relieve these suffering people, and they no doubt thought it would secure them relief more speedily to pass the bill just as it came from the House; but I think that is not wise. I think if we amend the bill properly the amendment will receive the prompt concurrence of the House, and secure relief as quickly as if we put the bill through in its present shape.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer to the Senator from New Jersey is that this bill does not levy a tax.

Mr. STOCKTON. It directs it to be levied.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course until another law is passed there will be no tax levied on personal property. I look on that portion of the bill as simply nugatory. This is a little bill for the relief of school-teachers suffering for want of pay, and I think we ought to pass it. Whether that clause is in the bill or not does not matter one particle, for as a matter of course in order to levy a tax on personal property there must be the consent of Congress or the action of the local Legislature. That is a subsequent thing. The money will be paid out of the Treasury of the United States as soon as the bill passes, and then whether a tax is levied or not will depend on the future action of Congress.

Mr. STOCKTON. If the Senator from Ohio is right in that proposition, then these words are mere surplusage. I do not think he is. I should like to have the bill read again, and I ask that Senator himself to listen to it. I understood it, hearing it read only once, to be a direction to levy this tax on personal property, and when the money was levied to pay it into the United States Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a simple direction that a tax on personal property shall be levied to reimburse this money. That is all of it; and Congress may do as it pleases about that hereafter. After all, it amounts simply to an appropriation of money to relieve an immediate necessity, to which probably some one in the House has added this provision in order to facilitate its passage.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Ohio is right, it is an entire relief from the objection made by the Senator from New Jersey. I wish the Senator from Ohio was right; but I think if he listens to the language of the bill he will be a little shaken in his impression. Let me read the words:

> And that the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax to an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this act upon personal property, including banks and other corporations in the said District, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States. The money hereby appropriated shall be disbursed under the supervision of the Commissioner of Education.

I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that this is a mere shadowing forth that Congress in the future will levy and collect a tax.

If that be the whole purpose of the words, it seems to me they are unfortunately strong. I can hardly see how a more specific direction could be laid upon the government of the District than is found in the words declaring "that the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my honorable friend has Congress the power to direct a legislative body what law to pass? We have absolute jurisdiction over the District. We can pass a law to levy this tax; but we cannot pass a law to direct the Legislature to do it. They must be governed by their own discretion as to what is just. It seems to me that while we, having power on the subject, may pass a law that will accomplish the intent declared by the House in this bill, yet we cannot tell the District Legislature that they shall levy a particular form of tax or pass a certain kind of tax bill. The members of the Legislature may say "we will vote as we feel on that bill," and they might refuse to pass the very bill that you require them to pass. Then Congress, as a matter of course, would have power to step in and pass such a law itself.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio may be speaking now with particular reference to the provisions in the organic act setting up the District government, and that act may be such in its nature as to warrant all he says; and if it be so I yield to his suggestion. Congress has power to make all needful rules and regulations for the Territories. In practice, a territorial government is created; the Legislature, which is a part of that government, has the power to pass statutes, subject to the approval or disapproval of Congress reserved in the organic act. In such a case as that, it seems to me, the Senator from Ohio would be warranted in the suggestion he makes. If it be true that the organic act here commits in toto to the District Legislature all legislative power, reserving nothing except the right of Congress to disapprove what that Legislature may do, then I think the Senator is right in saying that there would be grave doubt at least whether a provision like this would so modify or change the law as it stands as to operate itself imperatively and necessarily in effecting the levying and collecting of a tax. I still think, however, that in the presence of this statute, unless you assume that the District government first have the right, and second that they would be contumacious in exercising the right to refuse to do what good faith required they should do—I think these words import very much of that which the Senator from New Jersey attributes to them.

Now, Mr. President, I leave this subject with one remark, which I beg to make especially to my friend from Ohio. This is an advance made by Congress to the District government. It savors, therefore, of a contract in its nature; the District allowing Congress to advance the money accepts it, or the debtors of the District with the privity of the District government accept it; and the act which makes the advance contemplates, presupposes, and as far as we have the power requires, that they shall lay this tax. Could anybody say that the District government could with good faith hereafter fall upon that independence which the Senator from Ohio speaks of as possessed by a Legislature and say, each man for himself, "I vote on my own conscience and my own oath; I refuse to vote any tax here, I do not care what Congress says about it?" Would not the District government thus put itself very much in the attitude of a man who accepted from another money, and money in trust and upon an agreement, and having received the money should turn around and say, "Friend, you are tiresome; I do not regard this agreement; I have taken your money, but I decline to do anything which is incumbent upon me to secure its return?"

Mr. STEWART. I might let this provision pass unchallenged; I do not like to obstruct any benevolent effort that may be made to pay these teachers; but this requirement that "the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax to an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this act, upon personal property, including banks and other corporations in the said District, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States," would, if carried out, cost more than $100,000, or $200,000 probably. To provide a system for levying and collecting this tax on personal property in this District would cost a great deal more than the amount appropriated in the bill. It would involve a large sum to officers, and further complicate the affairs of the District of Columbia. It is certainly very vicious legislation. If personal property is to be assessed and taxes collected on it, we must have a system under which it can be done. Somebody must provide a system, either Congress or the District government.

Now, I hope that that clause will be stricken out from the bill. In reply to the point of the Senator from Ohio, that the Legislature of this District might or might not obey it, I will say that I think the suggestion is not well founded. I move to strike out the provision requiring the District government to levy a tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves to amend the bill by striking out all after "1874" in line nine.

Mr. STEWART. I doubt whether the Legislature of the District of Columbia has independent jurisdiction, as has been suggested. In fact I doubt whether it has any jurisdiction at all, or whether Congress has the power to grant it any jurisdiction, or whether there is any such thing as a Legislature in the District of Columbia with any vitality under the Constitution of the United States. Congress is clothed by the Constitution with power—

> To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States.

The power of Congress is "to exercise exclusive legislation." That is as strong as language could make it. If it was only that, there might, perhaps, be an argument; but it seems to me that the last clause of that section of the Constitution interprets the first so that its meaning cannot be misunderstood. The last clause of this section is:

> And to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

Now, would it be competent for Congress in a fort to organize a Legislative Assembly to govern the fort? If it would, then it would be competent for it to organize a Legislative Assembly to govern the District of Columbia, for it is "like authority." Exclusive legislative authority was conferred upon Congress over this District, the power being "to exercise exclusive legislative authority." Some question has been raised when legislative authority existed by the constitutions of several States in the Legislature whether it could be delegated to councils, &c.; but I apprehend that where the exclusive power of legislation is granted to Congress, Congress itself must exercise that power and cannot delegate it at all.

Mr. MORTON. Your argument then is, that the whole District government is unconstitutional?

Mr. STEWART. So far as it delegates the power of legislation, I have come to that conclusion. I have been investigating that subject and have come to that conclusion; and before that question is examined, I would not call on this Legislature to do any other act; certainly I would not call on the Legislature to devise a system of taxation upon the personal property of the District for the purpose of raising $100,000 and set all that machinery at work, expensive as it must be. It is perfectly competent for Congress, having appropriated this $100,000, to provide that it shall be reimbursed by taxation of the District. We have the power to do it and can provide the means; but in advance of any machinery, to put a law on the statute-book requiring the District government to inaugurate this system, which must be wasteful, cumbersome, and further involve the District in uncertainty, I think would be most unwise.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am informed there are $275,000 already assessed upon real estate of the District for this purpose. Why cannot this be paid out of that fund?

Mr. STEWART. It will be perfectly competent if this amendment prevails for Congress to reimburse itself by its exclusive power of legislation, having entire control of the matter hereafter. Whether they will ever do it or not is another matter; but it is better never to do it than to make the appropriation in this way and inaugurate a system that is going to cost three or four times the appropriation to get it into effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask the Senator from Nevada to withdraw his amendment to let the Senator from New Jersey offer one.

Mr. STEWART. Let me hear it.

Mr. STOCKTON. I rose a moment ago for the purpose of interrupting the Senator from Nevada to make this suggestion: if we go on discussing the relations between the District of Columbia and Congress we shall keep this bill from passing, which I presume we all want to see passed in a proper shape. I have an amendment which several gentlemen around me approve of. I simply want it read; and if any gentleman has a better one I shall feel perfectly willing to go for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from New Jersey will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in line 11 the words "levy and" and the words "a tax to," and to strike out in lines 12 and 13 the words "upon personal property, including banks and other corporations, in the said District," and insert:

> Out of the tax now assessed for school purposes on the real estate in said District, and which remains as yet uncollected.

So as to read:

> And that the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to collect an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this act out of the tax now assessed for school purposes on the real estate in said District, and which remains as yet uncollected, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I would prefer a suggestion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has an amendment. Let him send his amendment to the Chair, and I will modify mine to that extent.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I propose to strike out the clause indicated and insert:

> And this sum shall be charged against the District, to be deducted from any sum hereafter appropriated to its account.

Mr. STEWART. I accept that in lieu of my motion to strike out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is a large claim here against the Government which undoubtedly we shall consider, and if we find anything due we can make this deduction from it.

Mr. THURMAN. I am apprehensive that the amendment of my friend from New Jersey will not meet the case. I am not quite sure, although I could tell by sending for certain books, that there are unpaid school taxes sufficient to meet this sum.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There are unpaid school taxes to the amount of $200,000.

Mr. THURMAN. If that is the case, that objection does not lie. I was not aware exactly how that matter was.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Although, as it has been seen, the clause that was proposed to be stricken out and is now proposed to be amended appears to be extremely crude, it seems to me that the exigency of these suffering teachers is so great that it would be better to pass the bill precisely as it came from the House. We shall have ample time before this bill can be executed to make further legislation such as may seem proper. Of course, a tax cannot be levied without the machinery for levying that tax. It will take a considerable time and it will be expensive. Unquestionably a considerable part of this sum of money would be absorbed by the very machinery that would be absolutely necessary to carry it into effect. There are various questions to come up in relation to this matter. We have provided in the organic act that the taxation of this District shall not exceed 2 per cent.; and yet it is proposed by this bill to levy an additional tax upon personal property. The question will come up whether that is not in conflict with the organic act. If we send this bill back to the House with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, it raises a new question as to any further sums that may be appropriated by Congress for the improvements of the District that have already been made.

All these matters are dilatory, and will postpone the final action of Congress on this bill for an indefinite period. Therefore it would seem to me better that we pass the bill as recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia, precisely as it came from the House, although it may not meet with our approval in all its parts.

Mr. MORTON. I quite agree with the Senator from Vermont. I have received letters from some of these teachers and have been called upon by some of them, who have told me that they are in a suffering condition, that their wages have not been paid for five months, and only yesterday I saw two of them, who told me they had not the means of buying bread for their little families. I should be glad to see this bill pass this morning without any amendment.

The effect of the latter part of the bill is simply to charge the $97,000 up to the District and make it a debt against the District, because that part of it which directs the District Legislature to levy a tax on personal property and pay the amount back into the Treasury is a mere nullity. We all understand that. We can levy a tax on the District; we can direct a ministerial officer to levy that tax and collect it and pay it over; but when it comes to directing a Legislature to do it, that is a nullity. I think the bill had better be passed just as it is, because that part of it in regard to the levy of a tax is a mere nullity anyhow, and can do no possible harm.

Mr. THURMAN. I will state this further fact, that more than eight-tenths, I think nearer nine-tenths, of the teachers in this District are females dependent upon their labors for their support. I would greatly prefer that this bill should be in the shape suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, or the Senator from Maine; but I do not know that we can do much better than to pass it at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The morning hour has expired, and the Louisiana bill is before the Senate, upon which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORTON. Let us pass this bill; it will not take two minutes.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask the Senator from Louisiana to give way for a few minutes.

Mr. WEST. I will certainly do so. I am willing that the Louisiana matter be laid aside informally with this understanding, that if this teachers' bill leads to further protracted debate I shall call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Louisiana bill will be laid aside informally if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. STOCKTON. I rise to make a suggestion: The amendment I offered, I think, is better than that of the Senator from Maine, and several gentlemen here think so; but, as far as I am concerned, I am willing to withdraw it and let us vote immediately, without debate, on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, which will test the question whether the Senate desires to pass the bill without amendment or not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STOCKTON. I then suggest that the vote be taken on my amendment first, and then if that should fail, upon the amendment of the Senator from Maine; and after that let the vote be taken on the bill. It will not occupy over ten minutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine withdraws his amendment, and the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is pending.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not object to a vote being taken without debate after I make a single remark, which I beg to submit. The honorable Senator from Indiana was pleased to say that the second provision of this bill was a mere nullity and that everybody so understands. With great deference to him, I beg to say that I do not for one understand any such thing. On the contrary, I dissent from the law as I understood the Senator from Indiana to lay it down. If he were right, Indiana, New York, New Jersey, any other State, would have no power by an act of its Legislature to compel a board of supervisors to levy a tax. A board of supervisors is the local legislature of a county and is clothed in this respect with every attribute that I know of belonging to the Legislature of this District. Is it to be contended that a State cannot make mandatory a provision that a board of supervisors shall levy and collect a tax? Are not the books filled with instances in which the courts have said that a mandamus will lie to compel the execution of such an act? And if so, how can any Senator say that everybody knows that this is a mere nullity? On the contrary, Mr. President, it is, I submit, a substantial provision; and although I want this bill to be passed, unless we mean to enforce that branch of it, I respectfully submit that we had better strike it out and put something in its place, because I cannot believe that the House of Representatives, having passed this bill, will refuse to concur in an amendment designed merely to limit the embarrassment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON.]

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is to amend the bill so that, commencing in line 9, the latter clause will read:

> And that the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed forthwith to collect an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this act out of the tax now assessed for school purposes on the real estate in said District, but which remains as yet uncollected, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I understand, so far as one can understand anything from the very loose management of affairs in this District, that there are $270,000 of taxes which have been assessed and levied expressly as school taxes upon the real estate in this city but which are not collected. Why this has not been collected, why the collection officers of the District have not fulfilled their duty, I cannot imagine.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him one moment to state what the fact is?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. These taxes are not due until the 1st of July next. They have a singular system of taxation in this District. They levy a certain amount of taxes payable at the end of the fiscal year; that is to say, the 30th of June; and they allow a discount if the tax-payers will pay in advance—a discount of so much a month—but no tax-payer becomes delinquent until the end of the fiscal year. Those who have plenty of money and cannot make as good use of it as this discount affords pay their taxes in advance and get the discount. Those who have not the money, or who can make more interest than the discount would be, keep the money which would pay their taxes and employ it until they become due at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is eminently proper. It provides in substance that there shall be an advance from the Treasury of the United States of enough to pay this very deserving class of people, the school-teachers of the District, moneys which are due upon the faith and by the pledge of the taxes assessed and levied, but not collectible until the first day of the ensuing fiscal year, so that the amendment is, I think, eminently proper, if that be the design of Congress. But what a commentary it all is upon the condition of affairs in the government of the District that these people should be unpaid at this great lapse of time, when it is admitted that the school fund, the fund of school taxes which should be sacredly segregated for their use, has been misapplied and cannot now be found to satisfy their just claims!

I hold, Mr. President, in the anomalous condition of the people of this District, that the Congress of the United States is almost entirely responsible for the shortcomings, not to say something worse, of the people whom we set in power over them. The people of this District, as we all know, have but little voice in their own government; the board of public works, and their governor, and their secretary, and the chief machinery of their District being created by the voice of the President and confirmed by the action of this body. Therefore I say we are responsible for the mismanagement of our agents, and there is an equitable claim upon us that we should, so far as we may in justice to the rest of the people of this country, see that this deserving class of public employés should be fairly and fully paid. But I say it is a commentary, and a very sad commentary—I am sorry the commentary should be so just—that this fund, admitted to have been collected, should be so misapplied that these people have been kept out of their hard-earned money ever since last September. With the faith that this money will be repaid to the Treasury of the United States out of the school fund arising from taxes duly levied, and which shall be collectible in the course of the next few months, I shall vote for this measure as a measure of relief for these school-teachers. At the same time I trust that there will be such measures matured by the appropriate committees of this and the other House that such a condition of affairs will not be allowed to occur again. Here is nearly a hundred thousand dollars due to these people which has been raised by taxation and not one cent appropriated to the purpose for which it was designed. Where, in what community, would any party, any class, have strength to stand with mismanagement of this kind constantly brought home to them?

Mr. HAMLIN. I should prefer to have this bill amended as my colleague has suggested if there were no surrounding circumstances which I thought controlled me. This is a measure of relief, and as such I believe it is wise to pass the bill precisely as it came from the House. It is not in the nature of a contract; it incurs no obligation; it provides for no rights that Congress may not at a subsequent day change as it shall see fit. To amend the bill and send it back to the House and let it go upon the Speaker's table and be reached when no man can tell, is virtually to deny the great obligations we are under, or the great reasons which induce us to vote for the bill. Hence, while I am in favor of my colleague's amendment and would prefer to see the bill in that shape, I shall vote against that amendment and vote for the bill as it is for the reasons that I have stated. We can correct it hereafter.

Mr. CARPENTER. Without taking any time upon this bill, I desire to say that I shall vote for it as it is, precisely upon the ground the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] indicates. I want, however, in that connection to put in a caveat not to be bound to the opinion which has been expressed that there is no validity in that clause of this bill which commands the District government to levy a tax. As to the validity of the District government very grave doubts must exist, I think, in the mind of every lawyer; but conceding that government to have any validity whatever—in other words, conceding that Congress may create the government, then it is our instrumentality as much as a board of supervisors is the instrumentality of a State government, and it is as much under our control; and when we pass a law saying they are hereby required to do a certain thing, they can be compelled by mandamus to do that thing. They are not an independent State; they are not a State of the Union; they are a mere corporation created by Congress for governmental purposes, and this District government can only be vindicated upon the same ground that you would vindicate a mere city government in the District of Columbia, a municipal corporation. Upon any other ground it is wholly unconstitutional. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have exclusive power of legislation over this District; and there was great wisdom in that, this being the seat of the Government, where are our public buildings and our public records, in which the whole nation is interested. This being so, the whole nation is the legislative power for this District. Now, then, the only ground upon which we can justify the act erecting the District government is that it is a mere municipal government under the control of Congress, as the city government of New York is under the State government of New York; and a law which provides that the common council of New York shall do a certain thing, levy a certain tax, or that the board of supervisors of a certain county shall do it, is valid beyond all question; and so a law passed here commanding this District government, our municipality, our agent for legislative purposes, to do a certain thing in the line of legislative duty, is binding upon them, if there is any validity in anything.

Mr. STEWART. There is no doubt they can do something according to the theory of the Senator from Wisconsin, on which theory I am willing to vote for this bill with the understanding that there shall be some legislation which shall provide for it; but if this clause were carried into effect as it stands it would cost more than one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I shall not vote for this bill without the amendment, and I think this is the time to settle all these doubts. I agree with the Senator from New York and the Senator from Wisconsin that if the present District government has any legal existence this clause of the bill will be active and potential upon it. Nothing is more frequent than for the States to designate and authorize a county or township to levy a tax for a special purpose, and it has been and is constantly being enforced by mandamus; and why may not Congress do the same thing with a local government in this District where it has so exclusive control? We can do that; but I am unwilling with three hundred and seventy thousand and odd dollars of taxation assessed and not collected, as I am informed, to put it in the power of the District to levy this additional taxation without having the whole subject thoroughly scrutinized and settled upon an equitable basis. I think now is the time to strike out this clause, and give this proposed relief with the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, which is a proper one. Accept that, and there will be no objection whatever to this bill. Unless that amendment be adopted, I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. MORTON. It is not very important to this discussion, but I beg leave to dissent from the doctrine of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Wisconsin entirely. There is in my judgment no analogy at all between this case and that put by them. A corporation makes a contract, if you please, and issues a bond upon it. Where a judgment has been obtained upon the bond, it has been held that the courts having proper jurisdiction could issue a mandamus against a board of county commissioners or against a board of supervisors or those whose duty it was to levy the tax, to levy that tax, to carry out and execute a contract. It is entirely different from a duty imposed on a legislative body by an act of Congress where there is no contract at all. How can Congress compel a legislative body to make an appropriation or levy a tax? There is no way of compelling them. A court may compel a board of county commissioners under certain circumstances to do that; but does that bear any analogy to this case? Certainly not. I hope the bill will pass as it is.

Mr. STEWART. My point is that beyond the mere ministerial duties, so to speak, that are conferred on boards of supervisors to carry out the laws of States, or on any board here to carry out the laws of Congress, any legislative authority conferred upon any legislative body in this District is a nullity. But the levying of a tax under a law passed by Congress would be in pursuance of the power of Congress to cause that tax to be levied. That is direct and clear. We might direct that the Legislature should do it. We might direct that A B do it. It is in pursuance of the exclusive legislative authority of Congress. But in the organic act the legislative powers conferred on this District government, which are quite extensive, I think are a nullity; and beyond the duties that are ordinarily conferred upon boards of supervisors in counties, I think the powers conferred on this Legislature are all void and their acts outside of that line of duties are void. In other words, I do not believe that Congress can delegate its legislative power, when by the express terms of the Constitution that legislative power is exclusive in Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON.]

The question being put, the Chair declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. SPENCER. I call for a division.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope we shall not have the yeas and nays on this amendment. This practice of taking the yeas and nays on every question is one which consumes a great deal of time. I have no fear of the record.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Allow me to ask the Senator from Alabama to withdraw the call for a division. If he does that, the amendment will be adopted and the bill can go to the House and it be concurred in.

Mr. SPENCER. I want these teachers paid; I want them to have their money.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The amendment has been declared to be carried. Withdraw the call for a division.

Mr. RAMSEY. Let the amendment be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. STOCKTON.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he can inform us whether the District authorities will not be in the same trouble when the time comes around for the payment of these taxes, and will not be just as far in arrear as they now are?

Mr. BAYARD. With the consent of my friend from New Jersey, I will say to the Senator from Vermont that there is this amount already assessed and levied, $270,000 upon the real estate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Two hundred and four thousand dollars.

Mr. BAYARD. Well, $204,000. That is double the amount now appropriated by this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But my question is, whether that sum will not be then wanted to pay the accruing liabilities of the District to the school-teachers?

Mr. BAYARD. I have no doubt it will be wanted, and perhaps more will be wanted; but this $97,000 will be primarily deducted from it. If there will then be a deficiency, it must be remedied by some other legislation.

The object of this amendment is simply to grant a measure for present relief; that is all; and not to attempt to look into what seems to have been a palpable delinquency and misapplication of the public-school fund of the District. We can relieve these deserving people now and without adding to the taxation of the District by this bill. That is all the amendment proposes to do. We pay the $97,000 now, and are to have it repaid out of the fund which is collectible at the order of Congress which has already been assessed and levied. Should there be a deficiency hereafter, it will be time enough to meet that by proper legislation after proper examination.

Mr. STOCKTON. I simply wish to say, in reply to the Senator from Vermont, that the most important object of my amendment is this: While it assists to do the work for which the bill was intended—to pay these poor people immediately who need the money—it gets rid of the immense cost of a new assessment. It seems to me strange that when we have an assessment and a levy which has cost, as some one said, near as much as $97,000, we shall go to work and direct them to make a new assessment on new property. We save by this amendment almost the amount of the appropriation, while we meet the urgent necessity.

I desire to say before sitting down that I do not wish myself to be understood as agreeing with the Senator from Delaware in saying that this money has been misapplied, because it seems to me that that is inconsistent with the statement made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that the money had not been collected, and was not collectible by law.

Mr. BAYARD. Ninety-seven thousand dollars has been collected, and has been misapplied.

Mr. STOCKTON. I did not understand it so from the Senator from Ohio. He will put the matter correctly. I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that the reason this money had not been collected was that it was not collectible by law, and he gave a history of the law of this District in reference to such matters; at least I so understood; and therefore the amendment seemed to me to apply simply to relieve the government from a want of this money temporarily until the tax is collected, and the tax will be collected regularly under the law, supposing that the government of the District does its duty. The Senator from Ohio does not correct my statement. I thought I was not mistaken in what the Senator said.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to state for the information of the Senate that this bill passed in the House after quite a protracted and heated debate. The adoption here of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, while I am in favor of it myself, would, I think, kill the bill in the House. The clause he moves to strike out was put upon the bill in the House by a vote by yeas and nays. This is a case of charity. The bill is for the purpose of relieving the necessities of a very deserving class of people, and I hope no amendment will be put on the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey to change his amendment. The amendment, as I understand it, provides that the tax shall be collected forthwith, and by the law as it now stands these taxes are not due until the 1st of July. This amendment would have the effect of making taxes which are not collectible by the present law until the 1st of July collectible forthwith.

Mr. STOCKTON. I accept that suggestion and move to strike out the word "forthwith," and then the tax will be collected of course according to the law as it exists now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey as modified, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. Unanimous consent has been asked to rescind the order for the yeas and nays. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAYARD. The call for the yeas and nays was withdrawn on the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland to the Senator from Alabama that he should withdraw his demand for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand. Is the demand for a division withdrawn?

Mr. SPENCER. No; I do not withdraw it.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the demand for the yeas and nays is not withdrawn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No; it is not withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays has been withdrawn; but they can be ordered again. The yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the amendment be reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. That portion of the bill affected by the amendment will read, if the amendment prevails, as follows:

And the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to collect an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this act out of the tax now assessed for school purposes on the real estate in said District, but which remains as yet uncollected.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Conkling, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, and Stockton—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Tipton, and West—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Cooper, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hager, Jones, Lewis, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Robertson, Sargent, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1243) to abolish the system of mileage, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers;

A bill (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels;

A bill (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States the land in the White Earth Indian reservation;

A bill (H. R. No. 1942) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to employ a retired officer at sea, and, if physically and professionally qualified to perform his duties, the President is authorized to restore him to the active list;

A bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1600) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 1243) to abolish the system of mileage was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, what is termed the Louisiana question has been a prolific source of agitation before Congress and before the country ever since the presidential election of 1872. It may be expected that a renewal of the discussion of this question by the only representative in this body that that State is permitted to have will be undertaken with a view either to denounce the opponents of the cause which he maintains and extol the merits of those who act with him in its support, or with the other purpose of replying seriatim to all the arguments that have been adduced in favor of setting aside the government now existing in that State.

Until I am compelled to do so, I shall speak in no unkind terms of the men who have engaged in the outrages that have been perpetrated of late years in Louisiana. Others may feel warranted in denouncing them in terms that are not only painful to me to listen to, but would be more painful to me to proclaim. I shall therefore not seek to vindicate one class of the citizens of Louisiana at the expense of the shame and exposure of the other. I shall deal to some extent with a class of politicians who come up here and represent to the Congress of the United States that they are "the people of Louisiana." I will discuss their claims to be considered our people.

I am honored by a representative position of both classes here. I shall speak, therefore, in no unnecessary unkindness of the class to whom I am politically opposed; nor shall I claim anything more for the party friends now controling the government in my State than the credit to which they are entitled for the efforts made by them since their incoming to power to retrieve past errors and alleviate the burdens which distress her people.

In replying to the arguments so far made in favor of congressional interference, I shall confine myself to one proposition to-day, and that is, that all the information of which the Senate is in possession goes to the form of the election held in November, 1872, and does not relate to the fact. Until yesterday, by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] the issue had never been made in this Chamber and in Congress upon the rights of the voters, on the broad and popular ground of choice by the people; and although he has anticipated me in many of the points I shall make, they contain facts that cannot be repeated too often.

By the report of the Committee on Elections and Privileges of last session we are confined to the consideration of a mass of testimony taken, I submit, not to establish who was elected governor of Louisiana, but both produced and taken altogether to establish the right of one or the other of two contestants for a seat in this body. The instructions of the Senate to that committee were:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is any existing State government in Louisiana, &c.

To that same committee were also referred the credentials of John Ray and William L. McMillen, each claiming to be elected to the seat made vacant by the resignation of William Pitt Kellogg as Senator from the State of Louisiana. Now, in order to view the estimation in which that very committee considered the points submitted to them, look at the typographical execution of the report. They emphasize one question and almost totally ignore the other. After saying that they had devoted weeks to the investigation of the subject referred to them, they say:

The Senate must, therefore, determine whether either McMillen or Ray, and if either, which, is entitled to said seat.

No one can doubt in reading the testimony that the object contended for by Ray and McMillen respectively was a seat in this body, and hence each one of them sought only to establish the legality of the organization of the Legislature whence he derived his credentials. Could either of them have established that their credentials were in legal form, they would have been admitted into this body upon a prima facie case; and therefore the whole gravamen of their labors was directed to establishing that fact. The term was about to expire; there were but a few short weeks of it still enduring; and if either one of them could have made out a prima facie case, he would have been admitted to the Senate, and the Senate never would have gone into the merits of the case at all.

In examining into this contest the committee comparatively lost sight of the other and more important branch of the subject, or at least entered into it in a manner so imperfect as in no degree to warrant Congress in assuming to exercise, for the first time since the reconstruction of the South, the power to order an election for State officers under Federal legislation and control.

McMillen on one side and Ray on the other each conducted his case, not the case of Louisiana. Louisiana's case has never been heard here, and until it is heard I shall rest with perfect confidence upon the good sense of this body, knowing that it will not overturn a government until it knows that it was established in defiance of the wish and the intention of the people of the State.

The Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] in his last appeal to the Senate on the Louisiana question, has asserted that both sides agree upon sundry propositions connected therewith. In furtherance of this assertion, however, he assumes one position as mutually agreed upon that is by no means assented to by myself, and I do not believe that he will find another believer of his assertion in this body.

He says in his speech delivered on the 4th of March last, and printed in the RECORD of March 10:

> I ask the attention of the Senate to the fact that at this election electors of President and Vice-President ought to have been elected, because I claim that the decision of both Houses of Congress rejecting the vote of the electors of that State, and denying Louisiana any voice whatever in the election of President and Vice-President, is an adjudication by Congress that no result was accomplished by the pretended election of November 4, 1872. If anything was accomplished at that election, then presidential electors, a governor, and other State officers, and a Legislature were elected. But if no presidential electors were elected, then no election of governor and other State officers and members of the Legislature was effected. Congress having decided that the election was void as to presidential electors, it follows that the election of State officers and members of the Legislature held at the same time, and subject to the same objections, must be void also.

The Senator broadly and unwarrantably assumes a fact that the record totally contradicts him in. I cannot recall at the present moment, but I think it was on the 12th of February, 1873, that the two Houses met to act upon the votes cast by the different States. On the 10th of February the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body, who had been directed to inquire and report as to the presidential election in Louisiana, Arkansas, and other States, reported in regard to Louisiana as follows:

> We find that the official returns of the election of electors from the various parishes of Louisiana have never been counted by anybody having authority to count them.

They never said that that election was void; nor did Congress come to any such conclusion, because although Congress determined that question, respectively each House for itself, the record shows what was the conclusion in each House as to the result of that election. The Senate resolved as follows:

> That all the objections having been considered, no electoral vote purporting to be that of the State of Louisiana be counted.

And the House resolved:

> That in the judgment of the House, none of the returns reported by the tellers as electoral votes of the State of Louisiana should be counted.

The only conclusion that Congress has come to in regard to the vote of Louisiana is the conclusion that I want to hold you to to-day, that you do not know how the election has gone in Louisiana, and until you do know you have no right to interfere with it.

We are told that the Kellogg government is a gross usurpation, and that dire consequences are to result to the dominant party in Congress and in the country, and that we as Senators will be grossly derelict of our duty unless we apply a remedy which it is alleged exists under the instruction of the Constitution that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

This proposition has so far mainly been urged upon us by the Senator from Wisconsin. In the bill which he has introduced to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana he has assumed an existing state of facts in regard to affairs there from which I totally dissent, and which assumption I contend and shall endeavor to show to the Senate is not at all warranted by the information in its possession.

In the first place, let me ask what is our right of interference? That right must be based upon two general grounds; first, whether it is conferred upon us by the Constitution upon any given state of facts; and second, whether that state of facts exists.

I shall leave the argument on the first of these propositions to the more experienced members of this body, whose views will interest, instruct, and enlighten the Senate to a degree that I should be entirely without expectation of equaling, and I shall confine myself altogether to the proposition that the Senate has not been informed, nor attempted to inform itself, as to whether a state of facts exists growing out of the election of 1872 in Louisiana that either requires or even justifies Congress in interfering. I assert and maintain that the Senate does not know that William P. Kellogg was not elected governor at that time; that the information laid before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Forty-second Congress related entirely to what was done by certain returning boards, to what occurred through an order issued by a judge of a Federal court, and that the examination held by that committee scarcely touched upon what, if we are to exercise our right of interference, is the true subject of inquiry: How did the people of Louisiana vote on the 4th of November, 1872; for which person of the two then seeking their suffrages for the office of governor on that day did they actually vote? With the exception of myself, and I do not know that I ought even to except myself, nobody has given greater attention to this matter than the Senator from Wisconsin. He, after spending these weeks elaborating his report and studying that testimony, admits in the Senate that he does not believe Mr. McEnery was elected. Now, we know perfectly well that there were two men voted for on that day. The Senator from Wisconsin says:

> I do not think that Mr. McEnery was in fact elected.

Now, can there be an election without a result? If he does not think that in fact Mr. McEnery was elected on that day, he must think in fact the other man was. That is the question for Congress to determine, it seems to me, before it is called upon to determine whether it has the right constitutionally to interfere.

In a case somewhat analogous, the New Jersey case of 1840, known most generally as the Broad Seal case, and to which I shall have occasion to refer as I proceed, Congress took a direct and thorough method of ascertaining the facts connected therewith, as my friend from California [Mr. HAGER] very well knows, for he was counsel in the case. It may with some truth be contended that neither the acts of a returning board nor the order of a Federal judge can impose a government upon the people of a State, and that a government established by either of such means is no more republican in form than were it established by force of arms, however it might subsequently rigidly comply with the written form of a republican constitution.

It is the voice of the people alone that constitutes a government under our institutions. That "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" is an axiom too familiar to be forgotten, and I contend that Congress has not in its possession any evidence worthy of regard that Mr. Kellogg is governor in violation of the consent of the governed; and until it is so informed, it can do no greater wrong, can in no manner more widely depart from its obligation as one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government of the United States to guarantee to Louisiana a republican form of government, than unjustifiably to set aside the present government in that State and impose upon her people the necessity of making another choice through the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin.

William P. Kellogg is to-day governor of the State of Louisiana. He is recognized as such by your Chief Executive, by your co-ordinate branch of Congress who have admitted to seats upon their floor members properly certified by him to have been elected. He is recognized as such also by the supreme court of that State, and Congress ought to be satisfied, before it undertakes to overthrow him as the governor of one of the sovereign States of the Union, that he holds the office contrary to the desires, contrary to the expressed wish and intention of the people governed. They should know that, and they should know what the people of Louisiana willed in 1872 and what their wish is to-day before they undertake to interfere with him. There is not a particle of evidence of that kind here. If he holds the office by the wish and according to the intention of the people governed, then his government is republican in form under the constitution of that State, and as all the evidence goes to show that he does so hold it, those who would oust him from his position are compelled to show proof to the contrary.

Now let me call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the political antecedents of that State. Then also let me ask your attention to the conclusion that the Senator from Wisconsin himself admits, that the State on the day of that election was largely republican and cast a majority of republican votes. In April, 1868, the republican vote of the State of Louisiana was 64,901, and the democratic vote was 38,000, giving a republican majority of twenty-six thousand and some hundreds. Under the necessity, as it seems, of the democratic party in the year 1868 to carry that State at all hazards, they instigated such scenes of violence throughout the State that on the day of the election for Grant and Seymour in 1868 the colored people refrained from going to the polls. In the parish of Orleans alone, which only five months before polled 14,000 republican votes, we had to content ourselves with 240—two hundred and forty white men who had courage enough to go up and cast their votes. And so throughout the State; parishes that had cast from 500 to 1,000 votes for the republican candidate only a few short months before were found without a vote, and in some instances casting one, or two, or three votes. Is it any wonder under such circumstances that a democratic majority of forty-odd thousand should be rolled up and that the republican vote had fallen off some 50 per cent.? The democratic vote had increased 100 per cent. and the republican vote had fallen off 50 per cent., so that that election was a farce.

Then when we come to the election of 1870, when peace and tranquillity prevailed once more in the State and there was not that intense political excitement, we find that the republican State candidate received 65,500 votes and the democratic vote relapsed to its former number of 41,000, giving a republican majority on that occasion of 24,000 again. Now, I assert, and I can prove both by the testimony taken before the committee and by the conclusion admitted by the Senator from Wisconsin himself, that the colored people of Louisiana who were largely in the majority voted almost en masse in 1872 for the republican candidate. I do not think any Senator here will refute my assertion that as a class the colored men of the South are a unit as republicans. In some comments of Senator Trumbull, formerly a Senator from Illinois, on the report of the majority, he commented upon the division of the races in Louisiana and quoted the census to show that there were a hundred and odd more white males in Louisiana than there were blacks. He quoted the census correctly; there is no doubt about that; there are that number. The relative division is eighty-seven thousand and odd whites, and 86,913 blacks, males twenty-one years old and upward; but the Senator did not quote far enough. He should have examined the column of citizenship, and he would have discovered that the black citizens were 15,000 majority over the whites.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will you give me the page?

Mr. WEST. Page 619. We have an aggregate of 173,979 males, black and white, but we only have an aggregate of 159,001 citizens, black and white, and I ask you where are you to look for your unnaturalized people? Not among the blacks; we all know how they became naturalized. Now turn to page 629 of the first part of the census and you will find the same result derived there in a classification particularly of the State, and you will find also that in one single parish, the parish of Orleans, there are 9,000 unnaturalized foreigners.

Now, I will admit that if we were to go by the census or were we to go by such presumptions, you have no authority to establish a government in that State or in any State; but when a State government is in existence the knowledge of the choice that its people did very probably make should make us pause before we assume that they did not make that choice, and we should so assume arbitrarily if without proper knowledge of the facts we order that people to choose again.

It is necessary that the Senate should be asked once more to take a retrospective view of the political events that preceded the election in Louisiana in 1872. There were factions in both parties, or rather both parties embraced individuals and partial organizations inclining to a third, the liberal party. Several months before the presidential election the main parties in rivalry compacted their organizations and entered the field respectively as units. The republicans fell back upon their own lines and presented an unbroken front. The few remaining liberal republicans were gradually dissolved in the democratic organization. They first dropped the name of republican and finally surrendered and became part of the democratic party, which, to signalize the event, took unto itself a new name and was known thereafter in the canvass by the title which we also ascribe to it here, the fusion party; so that parties relapsed into their own normal elements, black and white.

Assuming that we have no white republicans there, and referring to the testimony of the parties particularly interested to prove that the black men voted the democratic ticket, we find it is the reverse. I will quote now from the testimony of Mr. McMillen. Mr. McMillen, who appeared here as a candidate for a seat in this body and consequently desired to make as favorable a showing for his side of the question as he conscientiously and honorably could, when asked as to that election "How many thousand votes were there in the colored vote that voted for Greeley?" he replied:

My impression always has been that there have been about as many colored people who voted in opposition to the republican ticket from one cause and another as there were of white people who voted the republican ticket, and that four or five thousand would cover the entire number throughout the State.

There was the admission which probably forced the conclusion upon the Senator from Wisconsin that the colored population of the State, outnumbering the white, in the last election were almost unanimous in their support of the republican ticket. Now what testimony did they bring forward to rebut that? and this is the only rebutting testimony in the whole book; all the other testimony pointing to the conclusion that the Senator admits. They brought forward a colored democrat; they did get one. They had a man by the name of Armstead, a colored man, nominated as secretary of state on the democratic ticket for the purpose of catching probably some votes of that race; and he admits that about two thousand up in Northern Louisiana voted the whole ticket from his information. He was cross-questioned by this very contestant, Mr. McMillen, who also wanted to establish the fact, if he could, that the colored men voted the democratic ticket, and Mr. McMillen on that same day, being asked by the Senator from Wisconsin whether the testimony of Mr. Armstead had occasioned him to form any different conclusion, admitted under oath that it did not. After Mr. Armstead's testimony was closed, the Senator from Wisconsin asked Mr. McMillen "if the same questions were put to you would you answer them now the same as you have answered them?" after hearing this witness' testimony that so many black men voted the democratic ticket in that State, Mr. McMillen says, "as they are down in the record," it does not change my mind; there were scarcely over five thousand under any circumstances.

Now we will see about this alliance, this fusion party, this unholy alliance that was styled by the men who subsequently engaged in it "as an alliance with infamy worse than infamy itself." That was the alliance that the Senator from Wisconsin himself said "was entered into for the purpose of establishing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intention of the voters of that State." It is almost incredible that any party organization could so demean itself as to renounce all its self-respect and the respect of the world in an eager grasp for place and power; and yet so stands the chronicle of the time. Among the many gentlemen who have been here claiming to represent the people of Louisiana in this effort to overthrow the government of that State was the candidate for the office of attorney-general on the fusion ticket, Mr. Ogden. As an illustration of what he at one time thought of the fellowship with which he eventually allied himself I give his remarks as reported to have been made in the democratic State convention.

This is the report:

Referring to the statement that we could not succeed without the co-operation of "some power without regard to the character of that power," the speaker spoke in deprecating terms of the proposition. He thought that a good ticket of honest men would succeed. The reform movement had utterly confused the politics of the State and prevented the coalition with a certain individual. You might call it sickly sentimentality, he said, but he utterly rejected the proposition of a coalition with Warmoth. [Applause.] It is not sickly sentimentality to uphold one's principles. Honesty is the best policy. * * * * * * *

It was true, he added, that those who would form this coalition thought that success could only be obtained by a fraudulent registration. * * *

He again warned the people from coalescing with Warmoth, who was a paralytic and a beggar before the people.

And yet in two months thereafter this gentleman spoke at the same stand with Governor Warmoth in support of the fusion ticket, and clasped hands across the infamous, not the bloody, chasm. What was the basis of this alliance? What was the service proffered on one hand and the reward promised on the other? Recourse must be had now once more to the report of the Senator from Wisconsin; and I will ask the Clerk to read what is marked on page 44 of the report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The testimony shows that leading and sagacious politicians of the State, who were acting with Warmoth, entertained the opinion before the election that Warmoth's control of the election machinery was equivalent to 20,000 votes; and we are satisfied, by the testimony, that this opinion was well founded.

Mr. WEST. Now I will ask the Clerk to be kind enough to turn to page 871, and read the testimony given by J. Q. A. Fellows.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Question. In your conversation with leading democrats in New Orleans during the last canvass or two, at the time the fusion was made by Governor Warmoth, state what their calculation was that his accession to the party would be worth to them.

Answer. I will premise by stating that for several years I have held myself somewhat neutral in politics, waiting for an opportunity to arise when I could unite with one party or another for the best interests of the State; and last spring and summer, when the canvass was approaching and being carried on, there was an effort made by some moderate democrats and reformers, and a large number of other people in Louisiana, especially in New Orleans, that stood in the same position with myself, to make a union with the best portion of the republican party, and secure the government of the State in all proper things. A fusion was continually thought of by the democrats with the governor. I was solicited time and again, probably by thirty, I think, to join in the movement to make the fusion. During that time say for two or three months, the whole matter was canvassed over and over again. They said that, with the assistance of the governor, or fusion with the governor, they could certainly carry the State against the republican party, or the custom-house party, or the negro party, as they called it. I thought it could not be done; that he had not votes enough at his command to do it. I understood that he had not over 1,000 voters that were his followers. They admitted that there were no more than 2,000; but they said this: that his power, with the assistance of the registration and election laws, was good for 20,000 votes by his appointing his men, or men who would work in his interest, as registrars, and the manipulation of the registration, and the appointment of commissioners of election and in placing the election polls, and they thought his influence was good for 20,000 votes. This was the repeated calculation of every one I talked with that finally went into the fusion party. Others refused to go in who were called "last-ditch" democrats, or "straight-out" democrats; many of them refused to go in the fusion, and many of them voted for Grant and Kellogg who were within my acquaintance. They made the same calculation; there was the calculation of one or two thousand followers, enough to make fifteen or twenty thousand altogether.

Mr. WEST. The reading by the Clerk just at this moment says that that was the common talk of the politicians in Louisiana as he understood it at that time. Now, that it was not only the common talk of the politicians, but that it was the sentiment of the democratic party at large of that State, I have evidence here. The Picayune of December 24, 1872, in discussing some questions connected with the election, shamelessly admits that this alliance was entered into for that very purpose. Here is its language:

All who went into the Greeley and Brown fusion movement were necessarily thrown into political relations with Warmoth, who was in the same line of policy, and as he had control of the ballot-boxes under the infamous registration and election laws of the State, it was thought to be neither necessary nor expedient to throw him off, since he was in a position to insure a fair election and perhaps keep some negroes from going to the polls.

There is the admission. These infamous registration and election laws that the democratic party had been crying out against for two whole years they then hugged to their bosoms and used them for their own base purposes. I will quote again from the same paper, of a different date, to show how far the respectable leaders of the democratic party in that State admitted that they had gone into this unholy alliance, how far they admitted that they were going to practice upon the ballot-box, and that although we might have a peaceable and a fair election, as they called it, when the votes came up to be taken out of the box they tumbled up Jack. That was the reason we had a peaceable election in Louisiana, because we did not believe that such infamy could be engaged in. We did not believe that whole ballot-boxes could be taken and returned with the number of 500 votes, and without the name of a single republican in a precinct strongly republican. Now, we have here the proceedings of the ratification of the fusion ticket, the shaking hands across the bloody chasm, in which the democratic candidate for governor, John McEnery, says:

It is known to many of you, my countrymen, that when the democratic convention in June assembled in your city I was the firm, decided, outspoken advocate, in that convention and out of it, for union and coalition of the conservative elements upon a just basis in opposition to the power of the military despot who sits enthroned at Washington; the man who in the exercise of despotic power has robbed us of our rights sitting enthroned at Washington. In this fusion, in this compact—if I may so term it—is recognized as binding upon the whole of the people of Louisiana, all the obligation which it imposes, you must accept this compact, this coalition, as an absolute entirety. There is to be no renunciation of a part and the acceptance of a part of it.

It is very plain what the fusion candidate for governor thought were to be the benefits to his prospects by the compact that he admitted bound him and his followers. What the party of the second part to this compact, Governor Warmoth, thought of it, is shown by his speech on the same occasion. He says:

A great deal has been said of me because of my course in relation to certain legislation in this State. It is known to all of you that I recommended in no uncertain language to the Legislature the repeal of a certain law. The Legislature did after a fashion modify these laws. Those bills have passed the Legislature, and are before me for signature. Now I propose to tell the people of this city, and through the press represented here the people of the State, the simple, plain reason that I do not sign these laws. In the first place they make no material modification of the old election and registration laws. In the second place, it was intended, when the repeal of these laws was forced through the Legislature, that instead of them General Grant should use his election law upon the people of this State; and then, besides that, the great mass of the people who have so long demanded the modification or repeal of these laws have changed their minds.

The great mass of the people who had denounced these laws as outrageous changed their minds and were willing to take all the false advantages under which they could be used for their benefit.

Now let me digress here a moment with reference to our election law. The Senator from Wisconsin the other day charged that Governor Warmoth had as a matter of decency repealed that election law. He did it under a necessity to perfect his own schemes. The Legislature elected at the same time with Governor Kellogg re-enacted one provision of it and only for a particular purpose. There were a number of vacancies in the Legislature, and the new election law which was approved by Governor Warmoth November 20, 1872, provided that those members should be returned to the Legislature through the instrumentality of police juries; and inasmuch as no police juries had been elected or were recognized in the various parishes throughout the State, the Legislature re-enacted that clause and enabled the governor for that particular time and occasion to appoint those police juries so that the machinery of election might be perfected to return members of the Legislature. He re-enacted so much of that iniquity as answered the purpose for the moment of returning a few men for the Legislature when we had already a majority there, and as soon as we got a full Legislature we repealed the law, and all the iniquity under which the people of Louisiana have complained that they have labored for years is now obsolete, and the next election in that State can with proper protection be held in peace and give a fair result.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I wish to ask the Senator a question, if he will allow me to do so. Has not that Legislature passed a law repealing the one alluded to, and is it not now in possession of the governor or to be held by him until after this Congress shall have adjourned?

Mr. WEST. The Legislature has passed a law repealing that act and the governor has signed it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Have they not passed another repealing that act and reviving and confirming the first act?

Mr. WEST. No, sir; not that I know of. At all events we know nothing about the laws of Louisiana until they are promulgated. After having urged in two successive annual messages to the Legislature the repeal of these very election laws, after succeeding in getting such repeal effected by the Legislature up to the point of his approval of the law, that act was put in his pocket and Warmoth audaciously avowed that the old law was good enough for his purpose just then. Is it not plain enough that it was his intention to defraud the voters of the State in the manner referred to in the testimony which the Clerk has read?

Follow up the proceedings in furtherance of this design, follow them step by step as illustrated in the testimony and by the documents transmitted to us by the President in his message of January 13, 1873. Among other evidence we find the confidential circular of the State registrar of voters.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to say a word on the question of the repeal of that election law? I understand that the law which was passed by Kellogg's legislature about a year ago, and which has been published, was repealed three or four days ago or within a very few days, about the time this bill was introduced here, and repealed because the friends of Kellogg's government thought it would be a bad point to show in Congress. I am informed and have seen a telegram from New Orleans saying that although Kellogg did have that law repealed so as to have it have its effect here in the Senate, on the last day of the session they passed another law in substance reinstating it, which Kellogg is keeping in his pocket until after the adjournment of Congress, and then is to approve and take the power back. If the Senator has any knowledge on that subject, I should like to know whether that is so or not.

Mr. WEST. I am not so familiar with the laws that governors of Louisiana carry in their pockets, it seems, as the Senator from Wisconsin. He gave us the evidence of that a year or two ago as to how adroitly these things could be manipulated. I do not know the fact.

Mr. CONKLING. Did you ever hear of it?

Mr. WEST. No, I never heard of it. We know nothing about the laws of Louisiana until they are promulgated; and I do not think the Senator need be apprehensive——

Mr. MORTON. I never heard of that before.

Mr. CARPENTER. I saw a dispatch yesterday to that effect, and from the source it came I believe it to be true, though I have no personal knowledge.

Mr. MORTON. I have Kellogg's dispatch the morning of the last day of the Legislature announcing the passage of the other act.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I ask the Senate's pardon for my apparent tediousness; but I am telling the true story of Louisiana; I am telling the story that we can take before our constituencies in the coming fall campaign and lay the true facts before them and let them judge between right and wrong in my State. Here is the confidential circular of the State registrar of voters under date of October 24, 1872, to the supervisors of registration, appointed not by the governor of the State, but throughout the State by the democratic State central committee with the proxies of the governor in blank in their hands; not a single republican was allowed to witness that election held that day in Louisiana behind the ballot-box; and what were the instructions to these convenient tools?

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
OFFICE OF STATE REGISTER OF VOTERS,
New Orleans, October 24, 1872.

SIR: In addition to the instructions contained in Circular No. 8, from this office, you are instructed—

First. In counting the ballots after election, count first the votes cast for presidential electors and members of Congress, keeping separate tally-lists on the Form No. 1, provided for that purpose, and making up and completing the statement of votes for each poll, upon Form No. 1. Then close the box, reseal it, and proceed in a similar manner, until all the national votes have been counted.

The republican party in the counting of the national votes was allowed to be represented under the law of Congress by the supervisors appointed by the district or circuit judge, but as soon as the counting of the national votes was done with they excluded those men and practiced their frauds in secret:

Then proceed with the counting of the State and parish votes, bearing in mind the fact that the United States supervisors of election and deputy marshals have no right whatever to scrutinize, inspect, or be present at the counting of the State and parish votes.

Then on November 2, 1872, the same State registrar of voters, in reply to the request of the chairman of the republican central committee that republican judges or commissioners should be allowed at the polls in the State of Louisiana, flatly denied the republican party a single representative.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
OFFICE OF STATE REGISTRATION OF VOTERS,
New Orleans, November 2, 1872.

SIR: In reply to your communication of date, I must respectfully decline compliance with your request to appoint one commissioner of election at each polling place, from the republican party, at the general election to be held November 4, 1872.

In regard to your second request, I have the honor to inform you that the list of polling places in this parish will be published in the official journal and other papers to-morrow, 3d instant.

Very respectfully,

B. P. BLANCHARD,
State Register of Voters and Supervisor of Registration, Parish of Orleans.

Hon. S. B. PACKARD,
President State Republican Committee.

Now, sir, will any Senator on this floor rise in his place and say that he countenances such proceedings as that? Will he rise in his place here and say that he believes a fair election could be held under such circumstances, or that the returns show anything like the choice of the people when that choice had to be submitted to such an ordeal as that? Where is the Senator who will say that he considers that justice was done then to the people of Louisiana?

Sir, it was with such preliminaries for a fair election as I have stated here, that severe exclusion which the fusion party desired to have of republican witnesses at the polls, that the sun of Austerlitz, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] said, illumined the glorious field on that morning the fusion party rallied around the banner of equal rights—equal rights, when a white man had a chance to vote and a black man could not! To follow out my friend's illustration the chief was surrounded by his marshals. He only had to give them the instructions to carry out his ideas, and the republican party was routed as the Austrians were on that memorable day. True, he had no Murat; there was no Lannes, or Bertrand, or Bernadotte; but there were convenient tools at hand who stood ready to carry out his instructions. "Go to those parishes and cheat the negroes, or let me never see your face again." That was his order; that was the glorious sun of Austerlitz that illumined the field—a field which I as a Louisianian blush to say was illumined in that way.

The curious in the valorous exploits of those creatures in the political combat can gratify their desire for information by referring to their deeds recorded in this testimony. The achievements of one of them were so unparalleled and extraordinary that I can scarcely avoid giving him the notoriety of personal mention. Mr. Cahoon, who went to Madison Parish as supervisor of registration and election, signalized his devotion to his mission by reporting a registration of 1,718 white voters in that parish, whereas the census of 1870 gives only 936 total white population. But his courage seems to have failed him, and after taking flight to New Orleans, where he secured all the facilities for making up his returns to order, he only returned 838 democratic voters—something less than 50 per cent. of his registration, but liberal enough, however, in comparison with the census and the democratic vote of 1870, which latter only reached 37. As a sample of how these returns were made up by that individual the Senator from New Jersey yesteday had quotations made from the testimony going to show that a justice of the peace went to the room where this man was making up these returns and swore him to them in blank.

Now let us have a little more summing up of the legerdemain—for there is no other name for it—that was practiced there upon ballot-boxes. In the election of 1870 the democrats carried sixteen parishes in the State of Louisiana by an aggregate majority of seventy-three hundred and odd. These same sixteen parishes were reported by the fusion board as giving an aggregate democratic majority of only 7,101 in 1872. Upon their own showing the democratic loss on their own ground was 262 votes. In the parishes exclusively democratic on this occasion the democratic vote fell back 262 votes in a majority of 7,000. In the remaining thirty-six parishes of the State, which were all carried by the republicans in 1870 by a majority of 32,616, the fusion board in 1872 returned an aggregate democratic majority of 1,556.

At an election which showed large republican gains in every other State of the Union, an astonishing gain of 34,171 in the opposite direction is claimed in the exclusively republican parishes of Louisiana by a board which admitted a republican gain in the exclusively democratic parishes of the State. Where they could manipulate the election machinery, and wanted to do it in republican localities, they totally reversed the vote, and in their own parishes, where they did not use it, their own vote fell off.

Now, sir, with respect to four parishes which the Senator from Wisconsin seems to think ought scarcely to have been admitted, because the testimony showed that the returns were forged, they only showed two hundred and thirty-odd majority for Mr. Kellogg. Let us throw them out and that only loses Mr. Kellogg 230 votes! They were forged for the purpose of depriving Mr. Kellogg of his legitimate majority in those parishes of nearly 5,000 votes, as shown by the previous elections. It would therefore suit very well to show that they were forged, and throw them out, because that takes away so many majority for Mr. Kellogg.

Doubtless the Senate has long ago wearied of this story of fraud. It is a sickening and disgusting history, one which I would fain avoid recounting; but it is necessary to the line of my argument, and after an allusion to one more glaring instance I will pass to other points. The report of the State registrar of voters shows that the vote of the parish of Orleans by the census, not including unnaturalized persons, should be 29,435. The fusion party registered 55,385 voters and counted the votes of 36,359; whether they actually voted or not is another question.

Such are only a few instances of the frauds shown by the testimony in the report. The whole book is filled with them. They were all perpetrated by and in the interest of the fusion party, for no members of the republican party were allowed as officers of the election. And it is upon such returns as were made through these instruments of fraud that the Senator from Wisconsin asks us to say that William P. Kellogg was not elected governor of Louisiana in 1872.

Let us from the record we have follow these returns, and judge of how much value they possess as giving an authentic account of the votes cast at the election. They first make their appearance in Governor Warmoth's testimony on pages 140, 141, 142. The governor says there that they came into his possession about the 14th of November; that he laid them before a certain board; that he took occasion to count some of them for the purpose of seeing who were elected presidential electors, and so certified himself. He also testifies that he counted them for the purpose of ascertaining who was elected a judge to a certain court wherein he wished a friend of his to be installed; and he goes on to testify that he kept possession of those returns until the 4th day of December; and yet in a subsequent part of the testimony he says that these returns were out of his hands on the 14th day of November and went into the hands of a returning board!

By following up Governor Warmoth's testimony upon page 494, it is evident that he maintained only a nominal custody of these returns. On page 1079 he says they were compiled by twenty-five or thirty clerks. On page 864 he says that he himself, unaided by any one, either clerks or members of a returning board, counted the whole vote for judges in the parish of Orleans.

The precise time when these returns, which are anything else than true returns of the election in Louisiana, were transferred from the Wharton board to the De Feriet board does not appear, and reference to their having been so transferred is only necessary to show that they were manipulated by still other parties before they finally found their way into the hands of the Forman board; from the governor to one board—then counted solely by himself—then through the compilation of thirty clerks to another board, the Forman board. The chief of this board testifies, on page 75, that his board was elected on the 11th December by the senate; not before noon of that day, it is presumed; and yet before midnight of that same date, within twelve hours of his becoming a member of the board, he and some of his associates compiled, counted, and returned under oath a mass of returns in manuscript that require sixty pages of this closely printed book to contain them. How much scrutiny did Mr. Forman and his associates give or have the opportunity of giving to these returns? Is it not evident that the thirty clerks, many of them the dirty instruments used behind the ballot-boxes on the day of the election, had compiled the returns to suit, and the Forman board, eager to declare their party successful, compounded with their consciences and made oath to facts of which they had no knowledge? Moreover, these returns profess to be signed by two men, Senators Todd and Hunsaker, and I hold their affidavits that they never did sign them. Their names are forged.

Some of the adventures of these returns were ludicrous enough. It having become necessary to remove them from the governor's office to prevent them from falling into the hands of the officers of the law, trusty henchmen were called into service, and during three nights and days the authentic (?) returns of the famous election in Louisiana were transferred by them to a place of hiding. In their pockets, in their pantaloons legs, in their boots, their hats, the reliable evidences of the expressed will of the people were sacredly transported. As one of the party tells me, "We went into the governor's office thin and came out fat!" They went in skeletons and came out Falstaffs. Their clothes were wadded with these authentic returns of the election in Louisiana. And then what did they do with them? They took them for safe-keeping to the quarters or the residence of a prominent candidate on the State ticket and left them in his charge a week for safe-keeping! They must of course have been very sacredly kept. Of course when they are brought here the parties that are interested in establishing them can with a deal of complacency appeal to these as the returns of how the people in Louisiana voted on that day. Why, sir, they were pointed out to one of these gentlemen in the room of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and the committee asked him if he knew those returns. Yes, he said, he did know them; he knew them exactly like a gambler knows his cards, by the backs. He knew they were put there, and without opening the box he said he knew those were the returns. Why? Because he came there prepared to say that he knew they were the returns.

And it is upon such vagrant testimony as this that the Senator from Wisconsin gravely asks us under our obligations as Senators to declare that William P. Kellogg was not elected governor of Louisiana He has woven such a mesh of legal technicalities around the subject, made such a conglomerate of returns, legal decisions, parallel cases, precedents and orders of Federal judges, that men of ordinary reason are almost diverted from contemplation of the one great, important fact—the fact paramount to all others—whom did the people of Louisiana elect governor?

Sir, I am sick of returns; one set is all a fraud, the other is all guess-work. I claim nothing by returns; but by the voice of the sovereign people of Louisiana, as expressed at the ballot-box, I maintain that the republican State ticket was elected, and no Senator here has, nor has the Senate itself, any evidence worthy of estimation to the contrary.

Two men were voted for as governor. All the proof that John McEnery was elected is shown to have been an organized fraud. If McEnery was not elected, his opponent was, and I repeat again that Congress cannot say to the contrary.

In the New Jersey case to which I have alluded, and which will be found reported in Reports of Committees, first session Twenty-sixth Congress, and in the eighth volume of the Congressional Globe, there were five rival candidates on each side claiming seats in the House of Representatives, and upon the admission of one or the other side depended the election of a Speaker. There were one hundred and sixteen democrats and one hundred and sixteen whigs returned to that Congress irrespective of the vote of New Jersey, which was at that time entitled to five members in the House. Both of the contesting parties from New Jersey bore certificates based upon returns made according to the laws of New Jersey. Congress assembled on the 2d of December, 1839, and the question as to the rights of the New Jersey members was not decided until the 8th day of July following; and that question was not decided upon any return made by election officers, but commissioners were sent into New Jersey who patiently examined the voters themselves, and that examination determined who was and who was not elected. Returns went for nothing in the case; it was decided by an examination of the voters themselves. The inquiry went to the fact as to how ballots were cast, and was not satisfied with returns.

Mr. President, it is a principle of the law of evidence "that the affirmative of the issue must be proved; and he who makes an assertion is the person who is expected to support it, before he calls on his opponent for an answer."

I submit that the Senator from Wisconsin has not supported the facts alleged in the preamble of his bill. Congress dare not with the evidence before it overturn the government of a sovereign State. The right to interfere is not warranted by the facts that alone can make that right. Will you do any less for Louisiana than convince yourselves what was the choice of her people?

The Senator from Wisconsin has pictured some dire events that might arise from the failure of Congress to interfere in this matter. Let me picture another dire event that might have arisen. Suppose in the returns of the electoral vote for President in 1872, 179 votes had been returned for General Grant and 179 votes for his opponent, be it Greeley or Gratz Brown, and suppose then that the presidential election had depended upon the eight votes of Louisiana, would you have admitted the presidential electors by the returns sent here by the fusion board? Would you have ordered a new election? No, sir; but you would have held this Government by the point of the bayonet until you ascertained how every man in that State voted, and I claim that you shall do Louisiana the same justice here that you would have done the national Government in ascertaining what was the choice of its people. You would not have permitted for one moment a determination upon returns so loaded with fraud as I have illustrated here, but the whole power of your Government would have been exerted to maintain itself until you could know what was the wish of the people of Louisiana; and I ask you to do the same for us.

Mr. President, the conclusions to which my mind is drawn by a consideration of the facts before the Senate are as follows:

The bill of the Senator from Wisconsin is predicated upon the assumption that there is no valid executive in Louisiana, and her laws do not permit one to be chosen until 1876; that there is no valid Legislature, but an invalid one now enacting laws.

But the Legislature is no longer enacting laws, and the laws of Louisiana will compel the election of a new one quite as soon as we could provide one.

We have no shadow of excuse, therefore, for interfering with more, than the executive.

We have no shadow of excuse for ordering a new election for the executive, merely because the wrong man is holding.

If we have power to dispossess the wrong man, we have power to possess the right one.

Before we can order a new election, we must find, not merely that Kellogg was not elected, but that no one was elected in 1872.

We know that an election was held on the day appointed by law.

We know that but two candidates were voted for. We are morally certain that one or the other had the greatest number of votes.

If it be conceded that the State has no Legislature, we must presume they will have one in November next.

And we morally know that Kellogg or McEnery was elected, and if we have any duty in the premises, it is the duty of finding which was elected.

That question has not been tried as yet. The Committee on Privileges and Elections tried the question whether McMillen or Ray was Senator. Another question was referred to the committee, but it was not investigated. Such testimony was taken as McMillen offered upon one side, and Ray upon the other.

The bill now sought to be referred to the committee is neither warranted by the facts, nor applicable to the political condition of affairs in Louisiana.

The opponents of the present administration in Louisiana, led here by the Senator from Wisconsin, are not insisting upon what they should claim as their rights, if they have any rights at all. Balked in the fraudulent scheme whereby they sought to capture the control of a State, they implore Congress now to afford them another opportunity.

Sir, if they believe that they are in the majority in Louisiana they know they will have an opportunity ere long to prove it. If they believe that McEnery was elected they should demand, and be satisfied with nothing less than that he should be possessed of the executive chair.

I am convinced that Mr. Kellogg was elected, and my efforts shall be continued to maintain him where he is. Did I think otherwise I would not hesitate a moment to bring forward measures looking to the installation of the rightful governor; but a new election ordered by Congress is no remedy for the evils which are complained of by those who favor it.

Now, Mr. President, I will pass from the politics of Louisiana and refer somewhat to her material and social interests. It has been the common charge rung throughout this country that the republicans of the South were responsible for the decay and the detriment and the disaster that prevail through many of those States. True, we are to a certain extent responsible. Let us understand what that extent is, and let us be judged by the facts that each Senator representing a State can present for consideration here.

The oppressed condition of the industrial and agricultural interests of Louisiana and the prostration of the commercial business of New Orleans are referred to as the results of republican misrule. Even these adverse circumstances are much exaggerated, and it is a gross error to attribute them as mainly due to political causes. We all know that whenever material prosperity lags, all people, and more particularly our people, address their first complaints against the administration of their government. This is the necessary consequence of our institutions. Dissatisfaction takes shape instantly, as opposed to the governing power, and the first thought of relief creates an expectation that a change of political control will insure it.

There is a maxim applicable here, and one which we will do well to consider in its application to the distress prevailing throughout the land, the spirit of which is likely to control in a great degree the political events of the next few years. It is said—

> Murder a man's family and he will brook it,
> But keep your hands out of his breeches pocket.

When the people of this country are distressed they will call us to account because their pockets suffer; and it is well for us to consider that maxim in its application to the country at large. That is a maxim which is influencing Louisiana in the complaints that the political management of that State has brought all its distress upon it. And yet the people of Louisiana should consider what are the causes of the distress prevailing there, and by the record decree to whom political evils are attributable.

I shall only speak now of the financial affairs of the State. That agriculture has not of late yielded adequate remuneration to those engaged in it is due to failures of crops and other causes, and it has been in no way affected by late political events. The misadjustment of the relations of labor and capital also for a time has been prejudicial, and will continue to work injury until better regulated.

But in looking at the immediate condition of the finances of Louisiana, in considering the extent of the debt of the State, it is well to inquire whether it is due to the republican party, and whether its exclusion from power would bring about a change for the better.

There has been a good deal of confusion as to the debt of the State of Louisiana. I present here the net debt of the State, without any reference to contingencies, many of them having become obsolete by the lapse of the legislation that made them, and I shall call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that when the State of Louisiana was relieved from military control and remitted to the control of the Legislature called into being under the policy of Andrew Johnson, the debt of that State was $5,018,635.14.

Under Mr. Johnson's policy we had a democratic Legislature. It commenced its existence on the 1st of January, 1866, and it held one session in that year, and held another in 1867, so that the total existence of the Andrew Johnson policy in the government of Louisiana was of eighteen months' duration, for it was suspended by the act of reconstruction of July 19, 1867. In eighteen months the democratic party of Louisiana, it being exclusively democratic, added $9,000,000 in round numbers to our debt, or, to give the exact figures, $8,997,300. A republican administration extending from April, 1868, to the present time has increased the debt of Louisiana $10,077,471.86. The "Andrew Johnson policy" Legislature increased our debt, $8,997,300, as I said. The first republican Legislature appropriated $8,911,488, but did not increase the debt that much. The second republican Legislature appropriated $9,607,282, and the last republican Legislature during its existence, this Legislature that you are told is squandering the substance of the people of Louisiana, got along with one-half of the amount required by either of its predecessors, namely, $4,875,269, during the two years of its existence. Senators must bear in mind that the expenditures of the State of Louisiana are something enormous, attributable to the topographical formation of the State, and the necessity of protection against overflows that are now, as I speak, inflicted on those people, rendering necessary an expenditure for levees alone annually almost of as much money as would run an ordinary Commonwealth in this vicinity.

The administration there has been criticised for what is called a repudiation of the debt. With a debt of $24,000,000 in that State, quite half of which is due to the democratic party, a great portion of it due also to the unfortunately dilapidated condition in which our levees were left at the conclusion of hostilities in that direction, and to the necessity that devolved on us to repair them—with such a debt oppressing us what was to be done? We had the alternative to pay, to repudiate, or to compromise. The property-holders of that State, who are in the main the democratic party, took counsel together. Some of them recommended repudiation; some of them recommended the scaling of the debt; and they finally, through the instigation and by the suggestion of the chamber of commerce, submitted a bill to be acted upon by the Legislature scaling the debt down to sixty cents, so that, although this somewhat questionable expedient has been entered into and adopted by a republican Legislature, it was done at the request of and in the interest of the democrats, and they must not take exception to it.

Mr. CONKLING. How is it with people out of the State, creditors; are they to take exception to it?

Mr. WEST. No; they had better take sixty cents, because if the democrats get into power they will not get a cent. [Laughter.] How that action was viewed by the chamber of commerce, a democratic institution, I will show.

> Mr. Sandidge offered a resolution of thanks to the Legislature, commending them for passing the funding bill and the evident intention shown toward measures in the interest of reform.
> Mr. Oglesby said such a resolution ought to pass. The chamber had advocated the measure, and it was due to the Legislature to thank them for their action. * * *
> The Legislature had acted more favorably toward the bondholders than toward us. If they had made it 50 per cent. it would have been an even thing; as it was they gave them 10 per cent. the advantage. The Chattanooga bondholders were the only ones who complained.

So the chamber of commerce wanted the debt of the State cut down to fifty cents on the dollar, and the republican Legislature said "no; we think we can pay sixty, and we will make it sixty." Now, sir, I know what the sentiment of the people of that State is in regard to that measure. I know that it meets almost universal approval there, and where it is disapproved it is by those who, if they had the power, would relieve themselves of what they consider a terrible and unjust incubus, and would repudiate every dollar of it.

Mr. President I want now to speak of the condition of business affairs in New Orleans. I want to give my convictions that the interruption to business in Louisiana, and especially in New Orleans, is not mainly due to political causes. I can remember the time when every pound of goods almost that was consumed west of the Alleghanies, and the exception was so rare that the remark is justifiable—"every pound" was transmitted to that region by way of New Orleans. The first time that ever I raised my hand to earn my own living I did it on the Delaware River, in loading five hundred barrels of flour to go by the way of New Orleans to the city of Saint Louis in 1838. Whole ship-loads would go to that city of goods bought in New York and Philadelphia and Baltimore and Boston, for Saint Louis,

Louisville, Memphis, and Cincinnati, and whole steamboat-loads would come down with produce that is now transmitted by railroad, by the transcontinental lines of communication; so that in the mere matter of forwarding in New Orleans the great supplies to the West and the great products of the West sent back to us we had a large and industrious community engaged.

Furthermore, we had a market there for western merchants. They used to resort there. We had our palatial dry-goods stores, our extensive hardware stores, our extensive boot and shoe trade, now gone to a great extent. But why gone? From political causes? Not altogether. At the outbreak of the war, or shortly before it, the railroad lines were just about perfecting a communication across the continent, and that means of communication, the direct resort of merchants to New York and the large cities of the East, competed materially first with our lines of transportation, and next with our resources of supply. New Orleans was already beginning to feel that the Mississippi had more mouths than one, and that she did not sit the queen of empire at the mouth of the great river. So it was. The war came on, closing up the mouth of the Mississippi River, closing up the dry-goods trade, the grocery trade, the boot and shoe trade, and the hardware trade, paralyzing the South and electrifying the North; and when business was resumed there, at the close of the war, we found that our customers had all gone North. Our lines of communication were broken up. And we did more than that, Mr. President; we discouraged northern capital from coming among us by refusing to consort socially with any man who differed politically with the majority of the white people there. These are some of the causes to which the decay of business in New Orleans is attributable. I feel them and I know them.

I saw that city years ago when it was a mart busy with all the energies of commerce, now to a degree paralyzed and its property lying vacant and seeking for tenants through the bigotry, in a great measure, and the prejudices of her people.

Again, the debt of the city we are taxed with as a great abuse; that is radical or republican dereliction again. Sir, we never had a republican administration in that city that did not diminish the debt, and when we have had democratic administrations there the people have almost besought the republicans to take the government out of their hands that they might even save the very paving-stones from being sold out of the streets.

I have shown that the evils under which Louisiana suffers are not altogether due to political causes, and for all political mismanagement the opponents of the republican party in that State are quite as much responsible as that party itself; and I have shown that if Congress has any duty to perform in the premises it is the duty of ascertaining who is the legal governor of Lonisiana; and before I conclude let me just say a few words in reply to the braggart boast that were it not for the Army of the United States the government of Mr. Kellogg could not be sustained a moment in that State.

Sir, I do not with any zest want to recall to the Senate the outrages that have been perpetrated there; but I ask the Senate and I ask the country, in view of the innumerable lives that have been sacrificed there since 1866, whether four hundred and seventy-six troops are any too many to preserve tranquillity and to repress outrage and crime in that State? Are they any too many to execute the laws—the mere revenue laws of the United States? And suppose they are kept there for the purpose of preserving tranquillity, suppose that if they were taken away the Kellogg government would not stand, why would it not stand? Sir, the Kellogg government will stand. It will stand forever, or republican government will stand as long as the people in that State are of their present mode of thinking; until you invite a war of races and arm the negro there. I tell Senators that 90 per cent. of the republican party in my State are colored people. Can we arm them to defend themselves against the minority, the whites? And a Senator on this floor brings in a bill to remit Louisiana to a state of civil war! No, sir; the people there are your wards. You have made them so by your enactments; and it is due to them that you should protect them. But if the men who oppose the government of Mr. Kellogg will meet us on the result of a fair election, we will meet them on that issue, but some of us—and they know it—are debarred from taking arms in our hands.

Now, Mr. President, does the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin meet this case at all? Is there any ground for it? Can Congress interfere? And would not every man who should give his dispassionate judgment and reflection to this case be satisfied, as I am, that Mr. Kellogg is the legitimate choice of the people, and should be left there to exercise the powers conferred by the people?

I am obliged to the Senate for their attention.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President——

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator allow me to read a telegram on a matter that was controverted here in the course of the remarks which I made? It is from Governor Kellogg, governor of Louisiana:

I am informed that some parties have telegraphed Senator CARPENTER and others that I have a bill before me, intending to sign and promulgate the same hereafter, which repeals the new election law. This is false. We can have a fair election under the present law. This is all republicans ask, and it is what the democracy hate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Under what present law, I would ask the Senator from Louisiana—the one passed when?

Mr. WEST. The law passed at the last session, and which has been promulgated within a few days.

Mr. STEVENSON. Do I understand Governor Kellogg to deny as a matter of fact that such a repealing act has been passed? I have received from a very respectable gentleman in Louisiana a dispatch telling me that Governor Kellogg holds in his pocket a bill repealing the election law referred to by the Senator from Louisiana. Now, I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana whether the Legislature of Louisiana did not repeal the bill to which he referred?

Mr. WEST. I reply to the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not asking about Kellogg; I want to know the fact whether the Legislature have not passed an act repealing that act to which the Senator from Louisiana referred.

Mr. WEST. And I reply to the Senator that if such is the case it is a matter of which I have no knowledge whatever, and I have the governor's telegram here, which I will put in my speech, saying that it is not so.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Please read the telegram again.

Mr. WEST. I will send it to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I am informed that some of the "last-ditchers" have telegraphed Senator CARPENTER and others that I have a bill before me, intending to sign and promulgate hereafter, which repeals the new election law. This is false. We can have a fair election under the present law. This is all republicans ask, and it is what the democracy hate.

W. P. KELLOGG.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If I understand that telegraphic dispatch, he says he has no such bill before him. But has such a bill been passed? He may not have it before him; and yet it may have been passed.

Mr. MORTON. I think that is a pretty square denial. The statement was made here to-day that on the last day of the session of the Legislature a bill had been passed which he had put into his pocket and had not signed, intending to hold it until after the controversy was over. I never heard of that until to-day, and I should be greatly astonished if it was true, and should regret it. I think that telegram is intended to meet that statement. He says that he holds no such bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The statement may have been stronger probably than was intended by the Senator from Indiana about his having it in his pocket. There has been a pamphlet just laid on our tables, and I will take occasion to read from it so as to show what a gentleman by the name of F. C. Zacharie says on the subject; whether true or not, of course I cannot undertake to say:

True, the usurping legislature passed an act repealing the act of 1873, and placing the power of appointing officers of registration and election in the hands of police juries of parishes and councils of cities. This was done in order to produce the impression on the mind of Congress that a fair election could be held under the regular State laws, and to convince them that no further relief was needed. But with unblushing effrontery the usurping legislature passed another act repealing the repealing act, and placing the power back in Kellogg's hands, and these two acts now await his signature, which he can affix constitutionally any time before the next meeting of the Legislature, so that he has it in his power to reinvest himself with the full control of that election. Besides this, the regular constitutional election in November will leave all the usurping senators, and all State officers not elected in the fall of 1872, in power, and Congress can no more recognize this rump with consistency than it can now recognize it attached to the holding-over senators.

The information is derived from that source and from others. I heard of it yesterday. Whether it is true or not, I do not know.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to read an extract from a letter which I have from Mr. Zacharie himself? He says:

The Legislature passed an act repealing the election law of 1873, putting the appointment of supervisors of registration and election back in the hands of the police juries and the common council where it was placed by the act of 1872. This was done in order to furnish an argument at Washington that there would be a fair election under the State law in 1874. Subsequently the Legislature passed another law repealing that act which they had just passed, so that if Congress fails to act, all that Governor Kellogg has to do is to take the last act from his pocket at any time before November 5, 1874, and sign it, and all the power will be again where it was under the obnoxious act which was repealed.

This letter is from F. C. Zacharie, who signs his name to it and pledges himself to the truth of the statement. I know nothing more about it.

Mr. WEST. The only authority that we have that such is the case comes from the other side of the Chamber. Our side do not agree with it. But suppose it is so; I say that that side is estopped from complaining against the election laws of Louisiana because they have used them to their advantage.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That is coming to the point——

Mr. WEST. I know nothing about the fact, but the complaint against it does not come with very good grace from the parties that adopted the law.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That is another matter. I have nothing to do with Mr. Warmoth. He is not my man, I want the honorable Senator to understand. The relations of Governor Warmoth a few years ago were probably entirely different from what they are now. However, I have nothing to do with that, and I do not want anything to do with it. Kellogg says simply, as I understand his dispatch, there is no such act before him.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a clear evasion.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the Senator from Louisiana say that they have passed no such law?

Mr. BAYARD. If we can gather any meaning from the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana, it is an admission that these two acts have been passed, one act professing to repeal the old election law and one repealing the repealing act; so that they can be produced from the pocket of this so-called governor on the eve of the election, and all this machinery which makes fraud in elections not only possible, but highly probable, will then be re-enacted should Mr. Kellogg be permitted to occupy the place he now does.

Mr. WEST. The Senator from Louisiana does not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir, he does not admit it; he has not the candor to state the fact. He merely says that he does not know as to the facts. He, professing to speak with special knowledge of the truth of facts in Louisiana, says here to-day in the presence of the Senate that in regard to this most important fact he has no knowledge whatever.

Mr. WEST. And he says the truth; he has no knowledge of it. He does not qualify it in any way. He never heard of it. It is new to him. That is what the Senator from Louisiana means without equivocation or reservation in any way.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a confession, then, of ignorance in regard to important facts which he certainly should have knowledge of before he undertakes to speak in regard to them.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, addressed the Senate. Having spoken for an hour,

Mr. SPRAGUE. If the Senator from Maryland will give way, I desire to move for an executive session.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

[The speech of Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, in full, will be found in the Appendix.]

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That one hundred copies of the report of the Committee on Printing on the memorial of the employing printers of Washington City be printed for the use of that committee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 15, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels;

And act (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 1600) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton;

An act (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States the land in the White Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, on which is situated their church and other buildings;

An act (H. R. No. 1942) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to employ a retired officer at sea, and, if physically and professionally qualified to perform his duties, the President is authorized to restore him to the active list; and

An act (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American register to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel.

CLERICAL FORCE OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the chief clerk of the War Department, in relation to the reduction of the clerical force in that Department; which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

DEPUTY SURVEYORS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a petition of deputy surveyors of public lands asking for an appropriation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF MAJOR WILLIAM B. SCOTT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation to pay the claim of the estate of Major William B. Scott; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BLACK BOB SHAWNEE INDIAN LANDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 1725) providing for the sale of lands of the Black Bob Shawnee Indians of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MISSION INDIANS, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an appropriation for the relief of the Mission Indians in California; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MEMPHIS AND VICKSBURGH RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 103) granting to the Memphis and Vicksburgh Railroad Company the right of way along the river bank at the national cemetery at Vicksburgh; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAYMENT OF TROOPS BY CHECKS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War inclosing a letter from the Paymaster-General, stating in full the objections to the scheme of making payments to troops by checks as provided for in House bill No. 546; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF THE MOUTH OF THE COQUILLE RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, in relation to the survey of the mouth of the Coquille River, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BERRY. I rise to a question of privilege. Having been unavoidably absent yesterday, I wish to state that if I had been present I would have voted "no" on the passage of both the currency bills.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees, and the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve. Reports are first in order from the Committee on Mileage.

ABOLITION OF MILEAGE SYSTEM.

Mr. BUNDY, from the Committee on Mileage, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1243) to abolish the system of mileage, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. The first section provides that after the passage of the act all allowance for mileage to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be thereby abolished. The second section provides that in lieu thereof each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall be entitled to receive his actual traveling expenses to and from Washington once each way for each session of Congress.

Mr. BUNDY. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is not the bill subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. HOLMAN. It keeps money in the Treasury.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The point is that it does not make an appropriation, if there be any point against it at all.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My point is that it takes money from the Treasury. Gentlemen say it does not. Of course it may or may not, but it is not for us to settle that question at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill does not increase the pay, but on the contrary reduces it. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Maine that the Chair cannot state whether this bill makes an appropriation or not, or whether it increases the expenses of the Government or not. Now, I submit there are some things the Chair will take notice of just as a court must take notice judicially of certain things, and the Chair knows that instead of this taking money from the Treasury it on the contrary retains money in the Treasury.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That may be or may not be.

Mr. CLYMER. But it does.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does retain money in the Treasury, as the Chair knows.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill may be considered now in the House.

Mr. BUNDY. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it by the sound.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I ask for a further count.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. BUNDY, and Mr. HALE of Maine, tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 81.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to recommit the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay the bill upon the table, as a test vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not make that motion, because the motion to recommit will serve as a test just as well as the motion to lay upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table; but I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the opposition to this bill comes from a most remarkable quarter, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who has been instrumental in reducing our salaries.

The SPEAKER. The opposition comes from the gentleman from Tennessee on a motion to recommit. The gentleman from Indiana demands the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. As a test vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on laying the bill on the table; and there were—yeas 63, nays 170, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Averill, Barber, Bell, Bradley, Buckner, Burchard, John B. Clark, jr., Stephen A. Cobb, Corwin, Crounse, Crutchfield, Darrall, Donnan, Eldredge, Farwell, Garfield, Giddings, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Kendall, Knapp, Lamar, Lynch, Marshall, Martin, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, Morey, Nesmith, Orth, Packard, Parsons, Pelham, Purman, Rainey, Rusk, Sawyer, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloss, George L. Smith, Strait, Sypher, Walls, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, Willie, and Pierce M. B. Young—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Gunckel, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Howe, Hunton, Hyde, Jewett, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lawson, Lofland, Lowe, Luttrell, Magee, Maynard, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Myers, Neal, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Read, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, St. John, Stone, Storm, Charles R. Thomas, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, James Wilson, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, and John D. Young—170.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, Barry, Bright, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Creamer, Crocker, Dobbins, Elliott, Field, Glover, Gooch, Harmer, Hathorn, Havens, Hendee, Hersey, Hynes, Killinger, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowndes, McLean, Moore, Morrison, Negley, Niles, O'Brien, Phillips, Potter, Pratt, Ransier, James C. Robinson, Sloan, Small, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Standiford, Stephens, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, White, William B. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Wolfe—57.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Would it be in order now to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] has the floor to demand the previous question.

Mr. BUNDY. I demand the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. The previous question is called, as I understand, on the motion of recommittal only.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done. If the previous question shall be seconded the first vote will be on the motion to recommit; and if the House should negative that motion the previous question goes on operating until the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. So that it will be impossible to submit any amendments, or have any discussion of the bill?

The SPEAKER. If the House shall second the demand for the previous question, it will.

Mr. RANDALL. Why, it has been discussed for fifty years.

A MEMBER. And has been defeated for fifty years.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 86, noes 56; no quorum voting.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for tellers, and, pending that, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. Suppose the previous question should not be seconded, what would be the first vote?

The SPEAKER. The first vote must, in any event, be on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well; suppose we take that vote without having the previous question ordered and the motion to recommit should not prevail, would that leave the bill open to be amended, if any gentleman desired to amend it?

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Tennessee will observe that it is impossible to take the vote on the motion to recommit, without the previous question, except by unanimous consent. For, unless the previous question is operating, the motion to recommit is a debatable motion; and if the previous question were not seconded, the Chair would have to assign the floor so long as any gentleman claimed it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not understand that anybody wants to debate the bill.

The SPEAKER. Of course gentlemen would be entitled to debate the bill if the House should not second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to make a motion to strike out the second section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was not the call for tellers too late?

The SPEAKER. No quorum voted. The Chair appoints as tellers Mr. BUNDY and Mr. MAYNARD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 61.

So the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the reading of the rule in regard to the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present; and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, (except that the member reporting the measure under consideration may close the debate, and the every-day practice since,) and to bring the House to a direct vote upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made.

The SPEAKER. That is the case now. The effect is to bring the House to a direct vote on the motion to commit, which is now pending. The Clerk will continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

And if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any; then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question. But its only effect, if a motion to postpone is pending, shall be to bring the House to a vote upon such motion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the yeas and nays should be called on the motion to recommit, and that motion should be carried and the morning hour expire during the call, will anything be gained as to time? Will not the committee be able to report the bill again to-morrow morning so that the question will come up again on the bill?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I only asked the question because, if that is so, we may as well settle the matter here.

Mr. RANDALL. It has to be settled.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am opposed to the bill because the House have already settled all this matter of salary and mileage once, and I doubt whether it is desirable to reopen the question.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I object to debate.

The main question was ordered, being upon recommitting the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered; but if there be no objection the call will be withdrawn.

No objection was made.

The question was taken on the motion to recommit the bill; and it was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. BUTLER of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 187, nays 49, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Davis, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gunckell, Hagans, Hamilton, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, Hodges, Holman, Hoskins, Hunter, Hunton, Hyde, Jewett, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lawson, Lofland, Lowe, Luttrell, Magee, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McNulta, Melliah, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Myers, Neal, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, St. John, Stone, Storm, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—189.

NAYS—Messrs. Averill, Barry, Bradley, Bromberg, Burchard, Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Corwin, Darrall, Donnan, Eldredge, Giddings, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W.

Hazelton, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Kendall, Knapp, Lynch, Marshall, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, Morey, Nesmith, Packard, Purman, Read, Rusk, Sawyer, Shanks, Sloss, Strait, Walls, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, and Willie—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Freeman Clarke, Creamer, Crocker, Dawes, Elliott, Glover, Hathorn, Hendee, Hersey, Hynes, Killinger, Lamar, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowndes, Maynard, McLean, Moore, Morrison, Negley, Niles, O'Brien, Phillips, Rainey, Ransier, James C. Robinson, Isaac W. Scudder, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloan, Small, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stephens, Stowell, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, White, William B. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolfe—53.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BUNDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise for the purpose of moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill; but before doing so I will yield to several gentlemen who have matters to present which will not give rise to debate.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. MELLISH, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Union League Club of the City of New York, in reference to the currency; which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolved, That the Union League Club of the City of New York disapproves of any action of Congress which will tend to inflate the currency of the United States, as unjustifiable by exigencies of commerce, as a violation of all the rules of finance and as contrary to the express pledges to the people of this nation.

Resolved, That we cordially approve the action of the governor of this State in promptly and clearly presenting to the Legislature and to the people the great perils involved in the proposed inflation of the currency, and we cordially indorse and sustain the sentiments expressed in his message.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded without delay to the members of both Houses of Congress.

GEOGRAPHICAL AND GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Be it resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the House what geographical and geological surveys under different Departments and branches of the Government are operating in the same and contiguous areas of territory west of the Mississippi River, and whether it be not practicable to consolidate them under one Department or to define the geographical limits to be embraced by each.

TIDE-FLATS IN D'WAMISH BAY.

Mr. ORR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2984) to relinquish the tide-flats in D'Wamish Bay to the city of Seattle, in the Territory of Washington; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LOCATION OF THE CAPITAL.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent to offer for consideration at this time the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the system of mileage for Senators and Representatives in Congress be abolished, and that the capital be moved to a place most central for all parts of the Union, to be hereafter selected and agreed upon.

Mr. POTTER. Could not that be put upon its passage now?

The SPEAKER. It can be by general consent..

Mr. RICE. I ask that Chicago be inserted as the place where the capital shall be located.

Mr. CROOKE. I would name Cheyenne City as the most central point.

Mr. BLAND. If mileage is to be abolished, we want the capital at the most central point.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. BLAND. I give notice that I will introduce this resolution on Monday next, if I can get the opportunity.

NEW STATE DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr COX. I ask unanimons consent to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas $3,400,000 have already been appropriated by Congress for the new State Department now in course of construction in this city under the direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury; and whereas the said Supervising Architect now asks Congress to appropriate $1,500,000 more, though the south wing walls, or one-sixth of the whole building, are not yet completed; and whereas it is evident that a very large amount of money is being spent in frivolous or questionable ornamentation; and whereas it is the opinion of competent judges that, estimating on the manner in which the work has been carried on, at least twelve years' time and $30,000,000 will be required to finish the whole building; and whereas it is also the opinion of competent judges that the plan adopted by the Supervising Architect has very serious defects in it, and that the building if completed on that plan will not only be a failure but a reproach to our architects: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a board of three well-known and competent architects, not in Government employ, residents of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, respectively, whose duty it shall be to examine and report what means are necessary to insure a more economical method of doing the work, and also a plan for improving the external appearance of as well as the internal arrangement of the building.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let that preamble and resolution be referred to some committee.

Mr. COX. All I ask is that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. While I have no objection to the reference or to the final passage of this resolution, I wish to say that the statements in the preamble cannot have been made by competent judges; on the contrary, they must have been made by perfectly imbecile fools, who do not know what they talk about.

Mr. COX. I do not know what an imbecile fool is.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] offers the resolution as it was handed to him.

Mr. COX. The gentleman can make his report upon the subject when he is prepared to do so.

No objection was made, and the preamble and resolution were accordingly referred.

JAMES ATKINS.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Ways and Means a bill (H. R. No. 2814) for the relief of James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN FRITZ.

Mr. BIERY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2985) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to consider the application of John Fritz for extension of patent for rolling iron; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not make a personal application to any gentleman, but he desires to say that the morning hour of Monday is provided by the rules for the introduction and reference of bills. That morning hour ought to be abolished and thrown into the ordinary morning hour, for if gentlemen insist upon introducing bills for reference every day and thus obstructing business, it is no saving to the business of the House at all to have a morning hour on Monday for the reference of bills. The regular business of the House ought not to be interfered with by the introduction and reference of bills except during the morning hour of Monday, when the largest possible latitude is given for that purpose, unless some particular reason or equity can be shown why the ordinary business of the House shall be interrupted for that purpose. The Chair has endeavored to enforce the rule confining the introduction of bills to the Monday morning hour, but when a gentleman rises and ask unanimous consent for that purpose the Chair cannot very well object. But the Chair would take the responsibility of saying that one sturdy objector in this House would be of very great advantage to the business of the House.

Mr. BIERY. I desire to say that the bill I have just introduced was not in my possession on Monday last; that is the reason I introduce it now.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call for the regular order.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to say that some time since the 7th of April was fixed for the consideration of the bill for the reduction of the Army. That time has passed, the business of the Committee on Banking and Currency having occupied the attention of the House until now. I will not now insist that the House shall proceed to consider the special order, but I desire to give notice that immediately upon the disposition of the legislative appropriation bill I will ask the House to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the reduction of the Army.

Mr. DAWES. What is the order to which the Chair refers?

The SPEAKER. The bill for the reduction of the Army was on the 11th of March made a special order for April 7, at half-past one o'clock, to the exclusion of all other orders.

Mr. DAWES. And from day to day until disposed of?

The SPEAKER. From day to day until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other orders, except appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. Was it made a special order in the House or in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. In the House.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. GARFIELD, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When this bill was last under consideration in the Committee of the Whole the paragraph beginning on page 5, making appropriations for compensation of officers and employés of the House of Representatives, had been read so far as the word "dollars," on line 111. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill at that point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Officer charged with disbursing of contingent fund, $556; Chief Clerk and Journal clerk, $3,000 each.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend by inserting after the words "Chief Clerk and Journal clerk" the words "and two reading clerks;" so as to make the salaries of these officers $3,000 each. If this amendment be agreed to I shall, when we reach line 116, move to strike out "ten" before the words "assistant clerks," and insert "eight," as that is the clause in which these two reading clerks are now included.

My reason for moving to make the salaries of these officers $3,000 is that I think their labors in this House entitle them to have precisely the same pay that we agreed in the last Congress they should have. In connection with the reduction of our own salaries we have cut down these officers; but I think the very hard kind of work that they have to perform entitles them to the pay which in the last Congress we agreed to give them. I hope there will be no objection on the part of the Committee on Appropriations or any other members of the House to this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the amendment is eminently proper and just. There are no more faithful officers here, none performing more constant duty, than these reading clerks. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, no man in this House can have a higher appreciation of the merits of our reading clerks than I have, and I should be exceedingly glad if it had been possible to let them pass by in the work of reducing salaries. The Committee on Appropriations, however, feel it their duty to remind the House that we have now reached in this bill the point where the increase of salaries began last year. It was with the officers in charge of our affairs in this House that the little beginning of the whole salary increase arose last year.

Now there is, as to the clause now under consideration, a real question in the mind of the Committee on Appropriations which we desire to raise, and which would have been raised on the moment. But in regard to the two officers embraced in the amendment, Congress plainly and unequivocally repealed the increase of salary as to them as well as to ourselves. The question is now merely whether we shall begin to reincrease salaries which, by the act of January 20 last, the House cut down. I hope we shall not have a long debate, but I desire the House to understand that this is the beginning of the work of reincreasing salaries.

Mr. KELLOGG. Notwithstanding our own salaries are cut down, I am perfectly willing to pay men according to their work; and I hold that these reading clerks are entitled to receive $3,000, instead of the salary to which we have reduced them.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KELLOGG, it was agreed to; there being ayes 104, noes not counted.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to amend by inserting after the words "Chief Clerk and Journal clerk" the words "while such positions are held by the present incumbents, and no longer, $3,600."

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the question of order whether this paragraph is open to amendment before it has been read through.

The CHAIRMAN. The point stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] seems to be correct. The Clerk will read the paragraph through, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] will be recognized.

Mr. GARFIELD. For convenience in considering the paragraph, I ask that we may treat each clause as a separate paragraph. I think this course will facilitate business; and it can be done if there be no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not object as to this particular paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. I apply the request to this paragraph only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the various clauses of the pending paragraph will be read and considered separately.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. My reason for offering this amendment is that the compensation of the Chief Clerk of the Senate is in this bill retained as it was last year, this clause being added: "while the present incumbent shall hold the office, and no longer." Another reason for the amendment is that the salary which it names is that which was fixed last year by this House for these officers, and surely their labors are no less now than they were formerly. The compensation they are now receiving is in fact less in some respects than it was before the action of the House last year. I presume this is well understood by members of the House, and that no further debate is necessary.

Mr. GARFIELD. The subject referred to in the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] was before the Committee on Appropriations, and I am directed to say that the committee was divided in opinion as to the effect of the repealing law. I will state the question, and ask the House to determine it. The law of March 3, 1873, named the Chief Clerk and the Journal clerk, and gave them an increase of $600 so long as the present incumbents should hold the positions. The question was raised whether that increase was not a peculium to those officers, not an increase of salary belonging to the position, and whether the repealing act of January 20 swept away a peculiar grant like this to those peculiar officials.

We were inclined to think it had swept them away, and we left out the increase from the text of the bill. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to restore them. The committee were divided as to what the effect was, and without recommendation have submitted the question to the House.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 39; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALBRIGHT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ALBRIGHT and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

Mr. KELLOGG. If I understand the amendment, it does not affect the amendment we have already adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as offered does not affect the amendment already offered to the bill by the committee.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. What I propose is to do what we have already done regarding the Chief Clerk of the Senate. We do not propose to do any more for these clerks than has been done for the Senate clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. It is to put them back to the place they occupied before the repeal of the salary bill.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADDELL. I move to amend the same paragraph, after the amendment just adopted, by inserting after "reading clerks" the following: "assistant Journal clerk and tally clerk."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ascertain what will be the effect of that amendment.

Mr. WADDELL. It is to give these clerks the same compensation as is given to the other clerks in the same paragraph. They are faithful and competent officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is increasing their salaries to $3,600 a year.

Mr. RANDALL. No; it only raises them to $3,000 each.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question is whether, after repealing these salaries at the demand of public sentiment, we shall go back and in the very same session of Congress restore them again.

Mr. RANDALL. That meant our salaries.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it were right to repeal the salary bill of the last session, a year ago, then it is not right we should restore all these increased salaries at this session.

Mr. WADDELL. The great difficulty about the increase of salaries was about its application to ourselves and not to the employés of the House. I hope the House will adopt the amendment I have offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the House, once for all, what I hoped I would not be compelled to say. There are no officers in the House who do not know that I am friendly to their getting whatever it is right they should have; but they are better paid than the majority of the clerks in this city who are employed all the time. Take the men in the Treasury Department, and in the various other Departments, men at the head of divisions, men who have done long years of patient service, who serve the year through, and who get only twelve hundred, fourteen hundred, sixteen hundred, or eighteen hundred dollars a year. There is not a man of them who would not be delighted to get the duty these clerks here have with a long vacation and the pay of most of the clerks in the employ of this House and the Senate. But because they are our friends, because we see them every day and stand before them when we vote, it is an ungracious thing for gentlemen to oppose them. If, however, we are now to begin one by one and restore all the salaries which have been reduced, we merely make a mock of ourselves in the face of the nation. All together have suffered a heavy reduction in salaries, because we believed justice and public sentiment required it at our hands, and now it is proposed to begin the business of restoring them one by one from the top to the bottom of the list. There is no logic in it unless we go through the whole of them and repeal the act of January 20, 1874. I shall demand a quorum of the committee on every vote, and shall carry them through to the yeas and nays of the House if necessary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The Committee informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 2550) making appropriations for the payment of the teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee resumed its session.

Mr. RANDALL. I have always here in this House been in favor of paying adequate salaries. I think it is an entire mistake not to pay a sufficient sum so as to allow an officer to live here with his family. Now, these very clerks of whom we are speaking are required to be as intelligent, and, if it may not be considered a reflection, I might say more intelligent than a member of Congress. Whenever you want to know anything in regard to past legislation, or in connection with the business of the House, where do we first go? To the clerks. If they were not men of character and integrity and intelligence we should not go to them, and they would not be equal to their places. In this instance I consider they are equal to their situations, and I consider the discrepancy between a member's salary of $5,000 and a clerk's of $3,000, as proposed in this amendment, is not too great. It is too great, perhaps, now, and I think the margin ought to be narrowed. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations proposes to save at the spigot. I will join with him when we shall reach those large items, those hundreds of thousands of dollars of contingent expenses, $20,000 here and $50,000 there. I shall join with him in cutting down this overgrowth of contingent appropriations. But let us not be afraid of doing justice to our clerks who are entitled to this compensation. If you expect them to be men of integrity you must pay them sufficiently, and, for one, I wish to give them such salaries that they will not attempt to go into the lobby or be interested in the legislation of this House in any particular.

Mr. SPEER. My theory of reform is, that you must save, not at the bung only, but at the spigot also. But while I would do that and pay a strict regard to little things in this House, it seems to me there is reason in this motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] for an increase to these two officers. These assistant clerks have increased duties in this Congress which they never had before. The number of members in this House is forty or fifty greater than it ever was before. And with that increased number of members comes increased business; and I venture to say that when the Journal of this first session of the Forty-third Congress shall have been published it will be found that it is one-third larger than the Journal of any session of equal length in the history of the Congress of this nation.

Therefore, while I stand by the principle that we should guard strictly and carefully every appropriation, whether it be a dollar or whether it be a hundred thousand dollars, the question still lies back of that, is the compensation enough, or is the proposed increase in itself right? Now, there are many officers of this House who have no additional labors with the increase of the number of members. The reason that applies here would not apply in their case. I propose, therefore, to treat every one of these officers simply upon his own individual merits, and if there is reason for any proposed increase, as I believe there is in this case, I shall not oppose it.

The question being taken on Mr. WADDELL's amendment, there were—ayes 77, noes 59; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that there shall be a quorum on this vote.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WADDELL, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. GARFIELD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Six assistant clerks, (including assistant Journal clerk,) at $2,592 each.

Mr. KELLOGG. In consequence of the amendment just adopted, I move to amend the paragraph by striking out the words "including assistant Journal clerk."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. The word "six" will have to be changed to "four." I move that that amendment be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Ten assistant clerks, including librarian and assistant librarian, at $2,160 each.

Mr. KELLOGG. The word "ten" should be changed to "eight," in consequence of the amendment adopted in regard to the reading clerks. I move that the paragraph be so amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Four assistant clerks, at $1,800 each.

Mr. PACKER. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "$1,800" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,000." As the other clerks have been restored to their original pay, I think it right that these assistant clerks shall also be restored to theirs.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The same class of duties is done——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have looked on with a great deal of surprise while the Committee has been increasing the salaries of these officers. It has been stated by different gentlemen that these clerks are all good men, and that they faithfully discharge their duties. No one questions that. But, as has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] we began last year just at this point. And why? Because it was supposed it would be less difficult to raise the salaries of those who were officers of the House, personally known to the members of the House. And experience shows that it is much easier to raise the salary of an officer who is well known to the various members of the House than of one who does not occupy that position. These gentlemen are associated with us every day. We see them daily, know them, are personally acquainted with them. We admire them for their good qualities. But, Mr. Chairman, that does not furnish a reason why we should raise their salaries to the exclusion of all others.

I am surprised that the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service should be the man to champion this movement. I have sat in my seat here, except when the vote has been taken, while the salaries have been raised of three or four different classes of clerks. I have voted against the increase, and it is the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, who proposes to raise the pay of these officers.

Now, sir, I was here last year when this whole question was voted on, and I voted against the raising of all these salaries. I believed then, and experience has proved the wisdom of my action and of that of those who acted with me, that the people would not sanction the raising of these salaries; and if ever the people have pronounced on any question in a manner which Congress could hear and ought to heed, it has been upon this question.

Now, sir, what has Congress done this session? It has repealed all the laws which have been passed raising the salaries of the different officers of the Government. It began at the top and has repealed them all. And now, as soon as we reach these officers again in this bill, it is proposed at the very first of them to raise the salaries to what they were before, because, it is said, these men discharge their duties. Sir, I believe that the officers of the Government everywhere discharge their duties. I believe there are very few exceptions to that rule, and I see no reason why the salaries of these officers of the Government should be raised any more than the salaries of others.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] who offers this amendment, does it upon the ground that we have just raised the salaries of the reading clerks and others, and that therefore we should raise the salaries of those to whom this amendment refers. Sir, when we reach another class of clerks there will be a proposition to raise their salaries, too, and the argument will be that you must raise the salaries of that class of clerks because you have raised the salaries of these, and the argument will become stronger, if there is any force in it at all, every time you raise the salary of an officer, because it may be said that the discrimination is still more unjust if, after raising so many, we should omit to raise the salary of a few.

Now, I hope this thing will stop right here. I hope we shall not go on repealing what was done earlier in the session, but shall stand by our action then.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to strike out the last word in order that I may say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. I simply wish to say that I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in regard to this amendment, and when he says that I stand here to champion the raising of all these salaries he speaks what he does not know. If he had watched my votes he would have seen that I have voted for only a single increase.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I did not say that the gentleman championed all these propositions to raise salaries. I said that he was the first to propose an increase.

Mr. KELLOGG. And I am willing that gentlemen of the House shall hold me responsible for the motion to increase the salaries of these reading clerks to what it was agreed they should have during the last Congress. I say, Mr. Chairman, they earn their money, and when men earn their money as these reading clerks have to do I am not to be frightened from increasing their pay, whether I am chairman of the Civil Service Reform Committee or any other. I will vote to increase the pay of every officer either here or in any of the Departments where I am satisfied that their work and ability and the interests of the service demand it. But I do not consider it a reason because I vote for the increase of salary to one clerk that I must vote for the increase of the salaries of others. I am with the gentleman from Illinois against increasing the salaries of these other clerks, and that is all I have to say. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. PACKER's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One engineer, $1,800.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to strike out "$1,800" and to insert "$2,160."

Mr. Chairman, I do not think the House intends to do injustice, but the House has already voted for the salary of the engineer of the Senate $2,160. Now the engineer of the House has, if anything, more duties to perform than the engineer of the Senate. He not only has more boilers to attend to, but he also has the superintendence of the entire lighting apparatus of the dome and also of the heating apparatus away down to the Senate wing. He has a great deal more responsibility, and he certainly ought to have the same salary as the engineer of the Senate has.

Mr. GARFIELD. We already pay this engineer more than the engineer of the whole Treasury building gets, and if the engineer of the Senate gets too much that is no reason why we should raise the salary of our own engineer.

Mr. BROMBERG. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARFIELD. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to rule that debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BROMBERG. I have already made that motion.

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] can oppose the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROMBERG. I made the motion first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] The Chair may make mistakes, but he intends to be impartial.

Mr. CONGER. I have moved to strike out the last word, and I yield my time to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. BROMBERG.]

Mr. BROMBERG. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says that if this House has put the salary of the engineer of the Senate too high, that is no reason why we should put the salary of the engineer of the House at the same figure. I take it for granted that this House considered carefully what it was doing when it fixed the salary of the Senate engineer at $2,160; and I do not think this House stands ready to-day to vote that it passed upon that salary carelessly or heedlessly. I know that I for one did not, and I do not believe any other member of this House will admit that he did. I think it is but simple justice that we should fix the salary of our engineer, he having much more onerous duties to perform and greater responsibility, at at least the same amount which we have agreed to give the engineer of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. BROMBERG; and it was not agreed to upon a division, ayes 25, noes not counted.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Clerk to Committee on Appropriations, $2,592; messenger to Committee on Appropriations, $1,314.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have an amendment to offer which would have been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] had he been here. It is to insert after the portion of the bill just read the following:

Clerk to Committee on War Claims, $2,484.

That is in accordance with a resolution which was passed by this House last January, and until that resolution is rescinded or repealed the action of the House in this bill should correspond to it. The Committee on Appropriations seems to have left out the clerk of the Committee on War Claims entirely.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that amendment on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, and it ought to be made. But I ask the gentleman to insert it after the provision relating to the Committee on Claims, as the Committee on Claims is the older committee.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to that,

Mr. HALE, of New York. In what form has this House determined the salary of the clerk of the Committee on War Claims? The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] says that he proposes this amendment in pursuance of a resolution of the House fixing the compensation of this clerk. What was that resolution?

Mr. KELLOGG. It was passed in January last, and this is the amount then fixed, as the law stood at that time.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think the gentleman is in error. That is why I ask him to refer to the resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have the resolution here. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the compensation of the clerk of the Committee on War Claims shall hereafter be the same as now paid to the clerk of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The salary proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut does not correspond with the salary of the clerk of the Committee on Claims, which may be found in the very next clause of this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. At the time this resolution was passed the salary of the clerk of the Committee on Claims was precisely what I have named in this amendment. The action of Congress since that time has changed the compensation of the clerk of the Committee on Claims and of some of the other committee clerks; but it has not changed in any manner whatever the compensation of the clerk of the Committee on War Claims

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move to amend the amendment so as to make the sum $2,160, the compensation provided by this bill for the clerk of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to take this occasion simply to repeat a protest that I have before made upon the floor of this House against precisely the kind of legislation which was initiated by the resolution introduced by the Senator from Connecticut. I think more mischief in this matter of salaries grows out of precisely that kind of delusive resolution, fixing somebody's salary at the same which somebody else gets, instead of naming the precise amount—more mischief grows out of that than out of anything else connected with the forms of legislation. And for one I give notice that in all cases hereafter whenever such a proposition comes to my ears I shall object to and oppose any resolution in that form. I do not believe this House has proposed, or now proposes, to pay the clerk of the Committee on War Claims a greater compensation than they pay to the clerk of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] in alluding to the "Senator from Connecticut," of course could not mean me. When the gentleman says there was anything designed to be delusive about the resolution which I offered last January, or that there was any trick in it, I tell him he is entirely mistaken. I was simply a representative of the Committee on War Claims on this floor. I was instructed to report that resolution, and I reported it in that form, and it was adopted by the House. The amendment which I have now sent up to the Clerk's desk merely carries out that resolution, as the law stood at that time.

I wish to say but one word more, for I shall submit to whatever may be the action of the House in this matter. I think the duties of the clerk of the Committee on War Claims are equal to those of the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations or of any other committee of this House. The chairman of that committee [Mr. LAWRENCE] is not now in his seat. But I will say this: from the hour that committee was organized during this session there has not been a day or night but what, upon the requisition of the chairman or some member of the committee, the clerk whom we have employed has been called upon to perform work for the committee. Though the committee may have accomplished very little at this session thus far, there has been a report drawn that kept the clerk constantly at work, day and night, in the early part of the session. I regret that the report has not been formally presented, but it has been printed and members know what it is. I say that the immense mass of claims before the committee, the peculiar character of those claims, and the work required of this clerk, entitle him to as high compensation as that received by either the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations or the clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means. I think the amendment I have sent to the desk proposes no higher compensation than this clerk is entitled to. I shall of course submit to whatever action the House may take.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sergeant-at-Arms, $4,320.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out $4,320 and inserting $5,000. I understand that heretofore the salary of the Sergeant-at-Arms has been $5,000, and possibly more. The reduction has been made I believe in consequence of the understanding that this officer had the use of a horse; but it has been decided that he should not have one. Therefore I think the pay ought to stand as it was before.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Door-keeper, $2,592.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to amend the clause just read by making the salary $3,000. Every gentleman on this floor is entirely conversant with the duties of the Door-keeper of this House. His attendance is required here constantly, not only during the sessions of the House, but before and after the sessions. I am authorized to say that during the last year the Door-keeper has been absent from his post of duty but seven days in the whole year, except by order of the House. For a gentleman who is competent to perform the duty required of the Door-keeper, and whose attendance is required here constantly, who is obliged to reside here the year round with his family, I submit that $3,000 is a small salary.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will simply give this officer precisely the same salary he has been receiving under the action of the last Congress. I do not propose to raise his salary one dollar, but simply to continue the compensation he is now receiving. In my judgment $3,000 is a very small compensation in view of the duties imposed upon this officer and the competent manner in which he discharges them. If any member of Congress during the vacation requires information in relation to books or documents he writes to the Door-keeper, who is obliged to go around and search up those documents and papers. I hope that the amendment will be adopted unanimously.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being ayes 32, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

First assistant postmaster, $2,088; fourteen messengers, seven at $1,728 each; and seven at $1,080 each.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer a series of amendments which I will submit together. I move to insert as the salary of the first assistant postmaster $1,800 instead of $2,088; to insert $1,500 instead of $1,728 as the compensation of each of the fourteen messengers; and $1,200 instead of $1,080 as the compensation of the seven other messengers.

Mr. STORM. Is not that an increase?

Mr. GARFIELD. It increases the pay of the lowest class, and decreases the pay of the other two classes.

Mr. STORM. What is the effect on the average?

Mr. GARFIELD. The average is a decrease of several hundred dollars on the whole. The committee thought as to the pay of these officers that the upper grades should be reduced, while some increase should be made in the lower grades. The effect of the amendment is to make a considerable total reduction.

Mr. SPEER. I offer an amendment to the amendment. I move an amendment to the amendment, in line 153, by striking out "seven," where it occurs twice in that line, and inserting "four" after the last "seven," at the end of the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The first relates to the number of messengers.

Mr. SPEER. Yes; I wish to strike that out. I move in line 154 to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "four," so it will read "fourteen messengers at $1,404 each."

I do this for this reason. I have been informed these fourteen messengers perform precisely the same work, precisely the same service from day to day, and Congress has been paying seven of them $1,700 each, and the other seven $700 less. Now I propose simply to equalize the pay of the fourteen messengers. It does not increase and does not diminish the compensation.

If my information is correct in reference to the messengers about the post-office I can see no sense and no justice in making a distinction of $700 in their compensation. The amendment submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is in the direction of my amendment, but does not go far enough, still recognizing a distinction of $300.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me in his time, I will say that the Committee on Appropriations found from the last year the name of these two classes of officers was the same, but hitherto seven were known as mail-boys and the others as mail-messengers. The distinction was this: one class of them have charge of the handling and the distribution of the mails in the office, and have to come at an early hour in the morning to sort and distribute the mails; the others are the mail-carriers, who take the packages already done up in bundles and drive around in the mail-wagon to deliver them at the houses of members. For years past there have been two classes of duties, one requiring as we thought a higher class of experience and intelligence than the other. It is true now and then a mail-boy does the work of the other, but their duties are distinct. We thought on the whole it would be better to bring the upper class down a little and the lower up a little, and the adjustment will reduce the total expense considerably.

Mr. SPEER. Let me say a word. If the information upon which I have made my amendment is incorrect, I will, of course, withdraw the amendment. If, as the gentleman from Ohio suggests, there is a difference in the labor performed, then, of course, my amendment should not be adopted; but I am credibly informed there is not any such difference in the duties—that the duties are interchangeable.

Mr. RICE. When I first departed from the recommendation of the chairman of the committee in increasing the salaries of the Chief Clerk and Journal clerk, I did it on the ground that it required an aptitude and a peculiar facility in doing that work, and that the experience of these gentlemen had entitled them to a larger sum. And when I voted to increase the salary of the assistant Journal clerk, I did it for the same reason, although I was loth to depart from the recommendation of the chairman of the committee. Now, I hold the amount of labor is not so much the question before the House as the amount of ability to perform a certain amount of labor. We all concede that superior abilities should receive higher pay. In this case, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just remarked, if the distinction exists which has been stated, then he is wrong in moving his amendment. If of these men engaged in the post-office of the House some are required to do more labor than others, and to sort and prepare the mails for delivery, I think then those who do prepare the mails for delivery are entitled to higher pay.

Mr. SPEER'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARFIELD'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move in line 156 after the word "stenographers" to insert the words "for committees;" so that it will read, "to stenographers for committees, $4,380 each." These are reporters for committees of the House, and it is necessary to distinguish them from the Official Reporters of the debates.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this sum, $4,380, the same compensation now fixed for the Official Reporters of the debates?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is the same fixed for these reporters of committees. We have not felt authorized to change that sum. If any gentleman of the House thinks it ought to be changed by making it any other sum, we have no objection to offer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the salaries of these stenographers for committees certainly should not be higher than we give to the reporters of debates.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the five Official Reporters of debates should have their salaries increased.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the salary fixed for the regular reporters?

Mr. GARFIELD. Forty-two hundred dollars a year each.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that amendment; to strike out $4,380 and insert $4,200.

Mr. SPEER. These stenographers for committees are paid by the year, and I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether there are not some sessions of Congress when there is but little work for these stenographers to do; whether it does not depend on special investigations and special committees ordered by the House outside of the regular business of the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. Theoretically that time may come, but practically we have not seen it during the past two years. There are now more investigations going on than the stenographers can overtake.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendent of the folding-room, $2,160; superintendent and assistant superintendent of the document-room, at $2,160 each; document file clerk, $1,800; five messengers, at $1,800, and six, at $1,440 each.

Mr. McKEE. I move to amend by striking out the words "and six at $1,440 each."

I endeavored to get through a resolution to ascertain the number of these employés, and the chairman of the committee told me I could find out easily enough how it was; but I believe as matters now stand that it is impossible to find out anything about it. The record, however, I understand shows that there are now more employés in the folding-room than we had before we did away with the franking privilege. A great deal of the work has been laid aside. There remains very little to do, and yet in place of retrenchment we find more messengers put on than there were before. As it now stands there are for this service five messengers at $1,800 each, and five at $1,440 each. The committee proposes that the number shall be five at $1,800 and six at $1,440. I see no use for this.

The fact is that the Door-keeper's department has grown and grown until now I believe he has one hundred and twenty-nine or one hundred and thirty employés about the Capitol under his control. I think that is altogether too much, and I trust the House will think so too. I therefore move to strike out the words I have mentioned.

Mr. DANFORD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out in line 162 "$1,800" and inserting "$1,400."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not germane. It has reference to another clause. The gentleman from Ohio can offer his amendment after this has been disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word. The Committee on Appropriations called the Door-keeper before them, and also had the advantage of the assistance of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts in regard to various classes of employés about the House. The chairman of the Committee on Accounts informed us, as did also the Door-keeper, that the entire number of the force had been reduced to the amount, I think, of 25 per cent. since the beginning of the present session, and that unless the franking privilege should be restored possibly a further reduction could be made; but if the franking privilege was restored a large increase would be required, especially in the folding department. The committee have reported such an amount of force as it seemed to them under the circumstances, after hearing both from the Door-keeper and from the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, was just and reasonable.

Mr. McKEE. How many has the Door-keeper in his department now?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know exactly how many.

Mr. McKEE. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations informs me that he does not know how many employés there are in the Door-keeper's department. It appears to me that he ought to know that fact.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know the numerical strength of the whole force. I did not know that it was of special importance that the committee should take a census of the entire force.

Mr. McKEE. Is it necessary that the Door-keeper should have one hundred and thirty employés under his direction?

Mr. GARFIELD. In reply to the gentleman I will state in the first place, in general terms, what employés the Door-keeper has in his department. He has first a class of messengers or door-keepers who attend the doors, although they are called messengers. There is no one door leading into this Hall, or into the galleries in the Hall, where it is not thought important to have at least one messenger; at the main doors there are two, for it is necessary there to have more than one on account of the number of messages constantly sent in to members of the House and as a protection of the lobbies of the House from invasion from without. In the next place, the Door-keeper has under his charge the document-room. It ought not to be; it ought to be a separate thing; but he has that under his charge, and he furnishes a considerable number of employés in the document-room, who are on his roll and paid by him, and who have charge of our vast body of documents.

In the next place, all the pages that we have here, and their number is considerable, are under the control of the Door-keeper and in his employment. In the next place, all persons employed in the folding of documents and speeches and everything that is printed by the authority of Congress, except documents that the Clerk sends out annually, are under the control of the Door-keeper; and finally, the Door-keeper has charge of the laborers employed in the care of this building throughout the entire wing of the Capitol which the House occupies.

Mr. McKEE. Has he more in his employment now than he had before?

Mr. GARFIELD. There has been a reduction of twenty-four since the session began.

The question being taken on Mr. McKEE'S amendment, it was disagreed to.

Mr. DANFORD. I move to amend the paragraph, as follows:

In line 162 strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,400," so that it will read "five messengers at $1,400;" and in line 163 strike out "$1,440" and insert "$1,240;" so that it will read "six at $1,240 each."

I am aware that it is rather an ungracious thing to stand here and prevent the increase of salaries of the employés of this House who serve us so attentively, so faithfully, and so efficiently. But, Mr. Chairman, we should not pay these employés more than their services are reasonably worth; and I submit to any gentleman upon this floor whether such a service as that required of this class of employés cannot be obtained in any district in this country for little more than one-half the amount in the committee's bill; and whether we are justified, Mr. Chairman, in paying for this class of service more than we can reasonably provide it for. While we have a Treasury with millions and hundreds of millions of dollars in it, I think we should take into account the fact that those who labor in this country, who produce its wealth either in the field or in the workshop, are not receiving for their work, for that kind of work that produces the wealth of this country, anything like $1,400 or $1,800 per annum. The average American laborer, the average clerk in this country, receives no such compensation as we give to the employés of this House, and we should take into account, sir, those who stand behind this Treasury, the farmers, the workmen, and the clerks who contribute their dollars and their dimes to the payment of the employés of this House. I take it that we can safely cut down the employés of this House one-half, and that we can have just as good and as efficient service as we have now.

Gentlemen say that we should pay the employés of the House here a sufficient amount of money to enable them to bring their families here and reside at the capital. I take it that we should do no such thing. There are many members of Congress upon this floor who can afford to do no such thing; and I think that our true rule should be to pay for this service what it is reasonably worth; and I take it that what it is reasonably worth is that which it can be obtained for in the country.

The question was taken on Mr. DANFORD'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 37, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 100.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twelve messengers during the session, (estimated at five months,) at the rate of $1,440 each per annum, $7,200.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to amend that clause by striking out "twelve" and inserting "eleven," for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question. I desire to inquire how much the force in the Door-keeper's department has been reduced by this bill from what it was in January last?

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee understood from the chairman of the Committee on Accounts that the entire force had been reduced 20 per cent., the reduction being twenty-two or twenty-three persons in all. That is what was represented to the committee, and I have here the notes which I took at the time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does that decrease appear in the number of officers named in the bill, or was it in the folding-room?

Mr. GARFIELD. A portion of the appropriation for this branch of the service is in a lump for the folding-room, and the reduction is there. We have not cut out any of the officers who are specially appropriated for. The reduction is in the folding-room and the amount appropriated for that purpose is reduced to the extent I have intimated.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to ask the gentleman a further question. I understand that the force in the folding-room was reduced in January last and that a certain number of persons were either discharged or suspended; but I understand also that instead of stopping the pay of the persons suspended those actually retained had to divide their pay with them, so that the pay of those retained was reduced by the amount paid to persons nominally discharged. Has the chairman any knowledge on that point?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, I have not; but I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Accounts could inform the gentleman.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOSKINS. I desire to renew my amendment in line 148, and I propose now to make the salary of the Door-keeper $2,892, instead of $3,000 as I proposed before.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the amendment proposes to go back, and is not in order.

Mr. HOSKINS. The amendment I now offer proposes to increase the salary of the Door-keeper $200 only, so as to make it $2,892 a year.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on the point of order that we cannot go back.

Mr. RANDALL. This is not going back; the amendment relates to a part of the pharagraph which is under consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was agreed that each of these clauses relating to an officer or class of officers should be considered as a paragraph.

Mr. HOSKINS. The whole paragraph relates to the salaries of different officers of the House, and I submit that amendments to it are in order as long as that subject is before the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was agreed for convenience that each of these clauses should be considered as a separate paragraph. That was agreed to by unanimous consent, and that agreement controls us.

Mr. STORM. I understood the Chair to state that each clause relating to an officer would be considered as a paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was so agreed, and that arrangement only relates to the paragraph now under consideration down to the appropriations for the public printing.

I made the proposition distinctly, that for the sake of convenience and dispatch of business each one of these separate clauses should be considered as a paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts that, as there seems to be a difference of opinion, the point of order will be withdrawn. If the point of order be insisted upon, the Chair will be compelled to rule that, having submitted to the Committee of the Whole the proposition that each clause be treated as a paragraph, and no objection being made, the proposed amendment is not in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. At the request of the Chair I withdraw my point of order; but I give notice that I will insist upon it if another amendment of the kind is offered.

Mr. FORT. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being insisted upon, the Chair rules that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. McKEE. I move to amend, by inserting after the clause just read the following:

All employés of the Door-keeper's department shall be employed and discharged by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that this is new legislation, and therefore not in order.

Mr. McKEE. This is just the place to put it in, by the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. It changes existing laws and empowers a committee to regulate the employment of persons, that committee being now authorized only to settle the accounts. This amendment proposes to make the committee the appointing power, taking that power from the Door-keeper, where it is now lodged.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it lodged with the Door-keeper by virtue of any clause of an appropriation bill or any other legislation?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know how that is. But this amendment proposes to change the law as it now stands.

Mr. McKEE. Where is that law?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is incumbent upon the gentleman to show that he does not propose to change the law. It is well known by everybody here that the Door-keeper now appoints the force under him.

Mr. FORT. By what law?

Mr. GARFIELD. Even if only by consent it is now the law of custom. It is proposed to make a law which does not now exist, and to clothe a committee of this House with appointing power. Nobody claims that that has ever been done, or that there is now any authority of law for doing it. We are now asked to confer upon a committee of this House an authority which it is not pretended they have, and certainly that is new legislation.

Mr. McKEE. It is a thing eminently proper to do, and it should have been done long ago.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is a question of the merits of the amendment. I am making a point of order, not discussing the merits of the amendment.

Mr. McKEE. I cannot find any law authorizing the Door-keeper to make these appointments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. McKEE. Because it changes existing law, when there is no law to be changed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled upon the point. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKEE] suggests reasons for the ruling of the Chair; they are the reasons of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For clerks of committees, $15,000.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out $15,000 and inserting $25,000. I find by reference to a letter of the Secretary of the Senate, Miscellaneous Document No. 5, that the clerks of the committees of the Senate, except those to whom regular salaries are given, receive $7.20 per day each, while the clerks of the House receive only $4.80. Certainly the amount of work which a clerk of a House committee is called upon to perform is at least equal to that performed by the clerk of a Senate committee. I always try to act reasonably and justly. I should like to know some reason why the clerk of a House committee should not be paid the same salary as the clerk of a Senate committee, as he does at least the same amount of work.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order, one speech upon that side having been made.

Mr. MYERS. I desire, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BROMBERG. I have not occupied all of my five minutes, and I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will decline to avail myself of the kindness of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. BROMBERG,] but will take the floor in my own right after a speech in opposition to this amendment has been made.

Mr. MYERS. I move to amend the amendment so as to make it $20,000 instead of $25,000. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] has already said, I find that the amount allowed to clerks of Senate committees is $25,000, and the amount proposed here to the clerks of committees of the House is $15,000. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] why there should be this discrepancy. There are almost as many clerks of committees in the House as in the Senate.

Several MEMBERS. There are more of them.

Mr. MYERS. No; there are not more, but there are nearly as many. Some clerks of the House are paid by fixed salaries. I should like to have some explanation by the chairman of the committee why $10,000 more should be appropriated for the Senate clerks than for the House clerks.

My friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, suggests that it takes more to pay them. I believe we have only a few less clerks here than in the Senate; and I offer the amendment because I want to allow more to the clerks of the House. There is no reason whatever for the discrepancy. Our clerks do as much labor as those in the Senate; they do as faithful service, working frequently when the Senate adjourns over. I desire some explanation which may guide my vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. A few words in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS.] It has been the custom for many years to allow questions as to committee clerks and other matters relating to the special service of each branch to be determined by the branch itself. This year, however, as on one or two previous occasions, the Committee on Appropriations objected to the inequality of the salaries paid in the two Houses; and in this matter of committee clerks I have been instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, whenever the Committee of the Whole will permit me to go back, to offer an amendment to the clause relating to committee clerks of the Senate, so as to provide that no higher amount shall be paid to the clerks provided for in the contingent fund than the rate allowed in the House. This will settle the whole question. We have cut down very largely the amount asked for in the appropriation for Senate clerks. The Senate asked for contingent expenses, including clerks of committees, $65,000. We cut down the appropriation to $31,000; and we have reduced the amount for the House from over $20,000 to $15,000. If the committee will now allow the amendment which I have been instructed to offer, to be inserted in connection with the appropriation for clerks of Senate committees, I will present it.

Mr. MYERS. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman who is so anxious to have the pay of committee clerks in the two branches equalized objects, then I cannot present the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. I am anxious to increase the pay of our own clerks.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] will prevail rather than that of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. BROMBERG,] because I desire merely that enough money shall be appropriated to equalize the pay of the clerks of the House and those of the Senate. As to the amendment which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] informs us he will offer, I wish to say that such an amendment was offered when the paragraph was under consideration by the Committee of the Whole; that an amendment cutting down the amount appropriated as compensation for clerks of the Senate committees was rejected.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Now, sir, there are thirty-one of these clerks in the Senate and twenty-seven in the House. Although we have many more committees than the Senate, yet we have a smaller number of clerks. I assert without fear of contradiction that the committee clerks of the House do as much and more work than the committee clerks of the Senate, with very few exceptions. I see no reason for this discrimination against the committee clerks of this House; for I desire to call attention to the fact that in this entire appropriation bill this is, I believe, the only case of equality in the pay of employés of the two Houses.

The question being taken on Mr. MYERS's amendment to the amendment of Mr. BROMBERG, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 17, noes not counted.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. BROMBERG, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding documents, including pay of folders in the folding-rooms and materials, $50,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "50" and inserting "30," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $30,000. I am not sufficiently advised to know whether the latter sum may not be too large. I understand, however, that we have substantially two folding-rooms. In one of these, under the charge of the Clerk of the House, the documents that are bound for the use of members are folded and taken care of, to be delivered to the members. Then there is the folding-room below stairs where the documents that have hitherto been folded for distribution are taken in charge. The appropriation last year for the folding-room was $100,000, which included, I suppose, the appropriation for material and for labor. The superintendent, the assistant superintendent, and some other officers and employés of this room are provided for in another part of the bill, so that this appropriation of $50,000 as here proposed, or $30,000 as I move to make it, covers only the labor and material.

Formerly it was the practice, I believe, that persons designated in this bill as messengers, who are really assistant door-keepers, were at work in the folding-room during the recess of Congress, or some portion of it; but latterly that practice has been abandoned, I am told, and these messengers, or assistant door-keepers, are now not kept here during the summer months. Some are paid only during the session, and some are paid by the year; but whether paid by the session or by the year they go away during the recess, and the work done in the folding-room is done by laborers employed for that purpose.

No special political campaign will be pending the coming fall, no presidential campaign; and so there is no necessity for a large force in the folding-room to fold documents for distribution for political purposes. Besides, the franking privilege has been abolished; and the House, after deliberate consideration, has decided that it shall not be revived except so far as the country newspapers are concerned, and those are not folded here. No documents have yet been ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress at this session. Early in the session the House adopted a resolution for printing the Agricultural Report for two years; but the Senate (if I may be allowed to refer to that august body without violating parliamentary rule) has not yet agreed to that proposition; and I trust it will not do so. In this view of the case it seems to me that $30,000 is an abundantly large appropriation for this purpose, and that the Committee on Accounts, or whatever committee may have this matter in charge, should have some direction from the House as to the force that shall be kept here during the recess to work in the folding-room.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Since the abolition of the franking privilege, and the failure to authorize the publication of these public documents hitherto distributed, what necessity is there for even the appropriation of these $30,000?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, I am quite ignorant on this point. I do not know there is any necessity for that appropriation, but I understand it takes about $15,000 for the purpose of attending to and folding the documents printed as a matter of course. We order printed every document that comes to Congress, and when we order them printed, some sixteen hundred copies of each are printed as a matter of course. Therefore a certain number of these documents, one for each member, is folded under the direction of the Clerk of the House, and the expense of that is included in this appropriation. I understand it has been customary to appropriate for the House about $15,000 for that purpose. Then there will be about $15,000 left for the other purpose. I confess, as I have already said, I did not understand why we should make an appropriation of $15,000, but perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will be able to tell us.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I understand this is intended to cover certain documents printed as a matter of course. The appropriation was $100,000 last year. Is it understood, then, as a matter of fact, one-third has been done this year of the work which was done last year, when an enormous number of speeches and documents was circulated through the mails under the franking privilege?

Mr. RANDALL. I move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont so as to make it $25,000. I have examined this subject carefully, and I am convinced that is enough.

As a member of the Post-Office Committee I think I can say there is no probability whatever, even if this House should reinaugurate the franking privilege, that it can by no possibility pass the Senate during this session of Congress. That then brings us down to the expenditure of this money during a period of three months next year, that is to say from the first Monday in December, when the second session of this Congress assembles, to the 4th of March following. It seems to me, therefore, $25,000 is entirely sufficient.

It has been the habit heretofore of employing boys to fold speeches and documents. I am now informed (and if I am incorrect in my statement I am open to correction) that the duty which has been heretofore performed by these boys is now being done by those who are upon the roll of the Door-keeper, and who really have no other duty to perform. Not having any other duty to perform, they have been assigned, some of them, to this duty. We have provided for the payment of these persons, therefore, who have taken the place heretofore held by the boys of the folding-room. There is really no occasion therefore, in my judgment, to make this appropriation larger than $25,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I should say it would be a wise thing to have only one folding-room for the House. I believe the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has drawn an amendment which when in order I hope may be offered, as it proposes to consolidate these folding-rooms into one.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree to withdraw my amendment for the present in order that the gentleman may have an opportunity to offer that amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say a word in regard to the amount of these appropriations. Out of the sum here appropriated is paid the salary of those persons who are in the folding-room of the Clerk as well as in the folding-room of the Door-keeper. They have had hitherto, and for a series of years, $100,000, which sometimes even has been found insufficient. The committee after careful consideration thought they could reduce it, in view of the abolition of the franking privilege, to $50,000. I doubt whether a lower reduction would be safe in view of the fact that the Clerk of the House is required by law to send off the complete sets of statutes and documents which make really quite a large library every year. He is required not only to send them to every member of Congress, sending to each member's home address, but to the governors of States and to the governors of Territories. In all they make a large bulk of documents. He attends to folding, sending off, and purchasing the material for folding, and must keep up a room for that purpose. If we consolidate the two in accordance with the amendment of my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, it will probably be as wise a thing as we can do.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I hold in my hand an appropriation bill for 1866; and that was when the franking privilege was in existence, when documents were folded indiscriminately, as they were recently; and the appropriation for that year was $30,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Vermont that during the existence of the franking privilege I have sent off fifteen thousand speeches and documents a year, but since the abolition of the franking privilege I have not been able to send off more than a tithe of that number. It is not reasonable, therefore, the appropriation should be kept up at the former figures. I now withdraw my amendment, so as to enable the gentleman from Maine to offer his amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 177, after the word "dollars," add the following:
Provided, That after the 30th of June, 1874, all the folding of the House shall be done through the Clerk of the House, and the two folding-rooms now existing shall be united under that officer.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is not strictly an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] and I ask him to withdraw his amendment for the time being and allow a vote to be taken on this, after which he can renew his amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] will be permitted to withdraw his amendment for the present in order that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] may offer the amendment which has been read.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have risen to make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. McKEE. I rose also for the same purpose. I make the point of order that this amendment is new legislation.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If I am permitted I will make a statement in regard to what the law now is, which I think will dispose of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKEE] raises the point of order that this is new legislation. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] asked the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] to withdraw his amendment so that he, the gentleman from Maine, might offer an amendment. That amendment had been read and was known to the committee. The Chair asked the committee if consent was given. The committee gave consent. At that moment and before such consent the point should have been raised. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine is, in the judgment of the Chair, properly before the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine was to present his amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont then before the committee. It was only when that was done and the amendment of the gentleman from Maine came before the committee that the point of order would apply, if at all. It would have been premature to have submitted the point of order before the Chair stated that the substitution had been made; and it was at that time that the gentleman from Mississippi as well as myself rose to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets that neither of the gentlemen succeeded in getting the point of order made at the time they desired.

Mr. McKEE. I submit that the amendment has not been debated. The gentleman from Maine who offers it is the only one who could have discussed it. That gentleman has not said a word about the amendment. I submit that we could not have made the point of order more quickly than it has been made.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to state that when the Chair stated that the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont was withdrawn, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine was before the committee, I at once rose. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] rose at the same time to address a question to the gentleman from Maine. I interrupted the gentleman from Minnesota, and he yielded the floor to me to make the point of order, and the gentleman from Mississippi also rose for the same purpose. Hence I think the point of order was made in time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has admitted the amendment. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McKEE. What has become of the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has offered an amendment which the Chair has ruled to be in order.

Mr. HALE. I desire to speak five minutes to the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has raised a point of order, and the Chair will yield the floor to the gentleman if he desires further to discuss his point or to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have not yet presented my point of order. I wish to know if I am in time to make the point of order.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I submit that a point of order cannot be debated until it is presented.

Mr. BURCHARD. The point of order I make is not in regard to the substitution of one amendment for the other. My point of order is on the amendment itself, that it proposes new legislation and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that the amendment is properly before the committee and the gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McKEE. Does the Chair overrule the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Chairman, I have a right to ask if the Chair has overruled the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. For the fourth time the Chair will endeavor to state that he has overruled the point of order.

Mr. McKEE. But I understood the Chair to refuse to hear it, because it was not made in time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets the misunderstanding.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point of order that it is not in order to discuss what has been decided by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor, unless the gentleman from Mississippi appeals from the decision of the Chair. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Mississippi does not appeal, and the gentleman from Maine will proceed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know why there should be so much antagonism to this proposition. It is offered in good faith, and if adopted I am satisfied that the business of the House in regard to the folding of documents will be more satisfactorily performed than now. There is nothing gained in having two folding-rooms. And so far from this being any change in legislation, let me state to gentlemen that there is no law so far as I understand it for the present division of this labor. It has grown up and become sanctioned to some extent by usage, but there is certainly no good reason why there should be two folding-rooms.

The Clerk of the House seems to me, without casting any reflection on any officer, to be the proper officer to have charge of this duty. And by this amendment he will have the entire charge of the folding of the documents which the House orders to be printed. This will be concentrated under one officer.

If there be any question of patronage that troubles gentlemen, any question of getting men into these places, according as one officer or another shall have the control, that is not a question that troubles me. I have not anybody in the folding-room, I do not expect to have anybody, and I do not want to have anybody there. But let it be under the control of one man. If the question of patronage is to come in, and if employés are to be taken from the various sections of the country in such a way that all shall be fairly represented, one man will do it better than two. But primarily the work will be better done under the charge of one man than it is done now.

Now as to the amount. The committee looked into it carefully, and made a large reduction from last year. I am, for one, by no means certain but that $25,000 or even $20,000 might suffice; but there is nothing gained by putting in an appropriation so small that next year a deficiency will have to be provided for. Gentlemen have made that point; the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] now in my eye, has repeatedly made it upon this bill and other bills. Where there is danger of its resulting in that way that is a good point. I believe $30,000 at any rate to be ample; and if the work be placed under the control of one man, that sum will go further than what we have before appropriated for the larger work.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to oppose the amendment. I cannot myself see how it will cost any more to fold these documents as they are now folded than it will if we have it done under the direction of one man. The same rooms will have to be occupied, the same number of men employed, the same amount of material purchased. I fail to see where the saving can come in. The folding that is done under the supervision of the Clerk is of a different class altogether from the folding that is done under the direction of the Door-keeper, and under the supervision of the Clerk the same rooms will be occupied, the same amount of force required, and the same amount of materials used. The gentleman from Maine has failed to satisfy me that there will be a single dollar saved. If the argument of the gentleman is good that one man should have this matter wholly in charge, then, I think, we should strike out the word "Clerk," and insert "Door-keeper." I think it is entirely out of place to take this work away from the Door-keeper and give it to the Clerk. There are members upon this floor, members of the Committee on Appropriations, who know that this change ought not to take place. I am unwilling to augment the power of the Clerk of this House. This power is better lodged where it is, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will not prevail. I am sure nothing will be saved by it, and I move to amend his amendment by striking out the word "Clerk" and inserting "Door-keeper."

Mr. McKEE. I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, although I do not believe it is at all in order, and I will briefly state the reasons why I support it. The gentleman from Minnesota says that this power of patronage is rightly lodged in the Door-keeper. That, sir, I do not believe. I have sought here time and again to get information as to the Door-keeper's patronage here, and it has always been refused. I believe there are one hundred and thirty men employed in the Door-keeper's department, and there is a kind of ring here by which that patronage is dispensed at the commencement of each Congress. I am satisfied that we have more folders than we need. I believe we do not need half of them. There are surplus places there where they put men in for certain purposes. I am not particularly interested in this matter. We of the South have no patronage here; it is all given to New York and Pennsylvania We get no share of the patronage, and so are disinterested parties. I believe in dividing up the patronage. I believe that a committee of this House should appoint these men; but the Chair has ruled that an amendment of that nature would not be in order, because it would be new legislation, although he holds that it is not new legislation to provide that the Clerk shall have the control of this matter.

Now, sir, I wish to see these matters thoroughly investigated. If there is to be any such thing as fair dealing all around the House all its departments should be investigated, and the patronage ought to be cut down. It has grown to its present dimensions simply for the purpose of making places for men, and not because of any public necessity for it. The patronage of the Door-keeper's department has grown until it includes one hundred and thirty employés. I do not know how many the Clerk of the House has; but I will warrant you there are two or three times too many for the work required to be done. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will prevail; first, because it looks to economy; and, in the second place, because it looks to a division of the spoils.

Mr. BECK. I rise only to say a word. I am in the same happy condition, and so are all gentlemen on this side of the House, as the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. McKEE.] We have no interest in this patronage.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. You have not had a man turned out.

Mr. BECK. Not a man. I do not believe that Kentucky has a man employed around this Capitol, or in any of the Departments in Washington; if she has I do not know it.

Mr. McKEE. We will divide what we have with you, and give you half.

Mr. BECK. I rose to ask a question of the gentleman from Maine. Last year we appropriated $100,000 for the folding-room. The franking privilege expired on the 1st of July, and therefore we have the full benefit this year of whatever saving we may obtain in the public printing. We have this session ordered no Agricultural Reports to be printed, and they caused the great bulk of the expense of printing. Certainly fewer speeches have been circulated than usual since we have had to pay postage on them ourselves. I desire to know if the Committee on Appropriations are able to present to the House an account of the expenditures of the folding-room for the current fiscal year, and tell us whether the $100,000 has all been used, and, if so, how it has been used?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. BECK. The question I have asked might be answered; I have only spoken two minutes, and I was entitled to five. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to answer my question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the Chair will allow me, I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] that the Committee on Appropriations was exercised on this very question. Believing that there ought to be a surplus, we had an examination made; and I will say here, what I did not say before, not being impelled by a direct question, that I for one believe, in view of the fact that the franking privilege has been abolished, that during the last months of the last vacation and during the months of December and January, many more men were kept in the folding-room than were needed. But we found it almost impossible to get these men discharged; and that is one reason why I believe in changing the conduct of the matter here. I cannot tell the exact figures, for I do not have them here; but my recollection is that the showing is that the fund was absorbed, though I do not make that as an accurate statement. But we do believe that there were too many men kept in the folding-room.

Mr. BECK. What was the difficulty in discharging them?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot tell.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that they were kept there because of representations made by members to the Door-keeper that they should be retained. And the State of Maine has as many men there as any other State has.

Mr. BECK. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] think that $30,000 will be enough for next year?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do.

Mr. BUFFINTON. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] must be aware that the Forty-second Congress closed its session on the 4th of March of last year. From the 4th day of March, 1873, to the day of the meeting of the Forty-third Congress there was no one who had any control of the employés in the folding-room but the Door-keeper of the House of Representatives. There was no Committee on Accounts, no committee of any kind; for the House was not organized.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] to substitute "Door-keeper" for "Clerk" in the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment if the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] who desires to speak, will renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. That requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and the amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BURCHARD. I renew the amendment to the amendment. If this proposition is presented by the Committee on Appropriations in the interest of economy, I do not wish to antagonize it so far as the reduction of the amount is concerned. But the argument that has been made in favor of it does not appeal to me as a sufficient reason for supporting it.

In this very appropriation bill there is a recommendation that we appropriate $240,000 for the Department of Agriculture; I believe that is the amount. We propose, therefore, to keep up that Department. As has been stated, by the order of the House the usual number, or sixteen hundred copies of the Agricultural Report, will be printed for the use of members and of a few other privileged persons. I for one believe that instead of printing that number of copies of that document at an expense of $100 each, if we are to keep up the Agricultural Department we should print a proper number; and if we cannot send them free through he mails, if the Government is not willing that they should be so sent, then there should be some provision of law or appropriation made by which they can be sent to the people. Hence I believe it is necessary that that document should be printed, and that there should be a proper and necessary appropriation for the folding of that and other documents.

Now, if the Committee on Appropriations will say that they think that work can be done for less than $50,000, I am willing to vote for a less sum. But I will not vote for $30,000, or for even $15,000, merely to enable the Clerk to take charge of these documents, and fold them for the benefit of members and a few other privileged persons. As to the question of who should have charge of this work, it having been from time immemorial in the charge of the Door-keeper of the House, he having charge of the folding-room and documents, I see no reason for changing it, and therefore I shall vote against that proposition.

Mr. RAINEY. I desire to make a correction for the information of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] He says that there is no one employed in or around this Capitol from the State of Kentucky. I desire to assure him that there is a man from the State of Kentucky in the employment of the Government here as a policeman. I give him that piece of information so that he may know that Kentucky is represented among the employés about this Capitol.

One other word. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] and do not think it ought to be adopted. We elected and re-elected the present Door-keeper of the House because we had confidence in him and believed he would discharge the duties pertaining to his office faithfully and satisfactorily. I do not think we would now, in any factious spirit of opposition to him, by adopting any amendment, take out of his hands the duties we have hitherto confided to him and give them to any other officer of the House. I believe in dealing fairly with every officer of this House. I have no special favor to ask of the Door-keeper; and I do not know that he has ever conferred any special favor on me as a Representative; but I think it is due to him that he should be recognized in the capacity in which we have elected him, and should be allowed to continue the control of the officers now under his charge; that the control of these should not be transferred to the Clerk of the House. I object, therefore, to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine. I simply wanted to give this little piece of information to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BURCHARD. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. I renew it. I believe it is generally known that the Clerk of the House hails from the State of Pennsylvania. I do not think he asks this additional burden, and no Pennsylvanian, so far as I know, asks it on his behalf. I wish to say further that although I have been here a good many years, there is no one at present in the employ of the Door-keeper upon my recommendation, though at one time I had one lad in his employ. Therefore, in advocating that this service may still be rendered under the direction of the Door-keeper of the House, I can have no object in the shape of patronage.

Now we should legislate here with some object in view. What is the object of this amendment? It is certainly not in the interest of economy, because the cost is the same one way or the other. But the amendment is to be followed up, (and that is the only reason I now address the committee,) it is to be followed up, as intimated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] by an amendment reducing this appropriation from $50,000 to $30,000. Now, what have the Committee on Appropriations been doing all these months? They have heard evidence on the various matters connected with this bill, and they come here expecting us to follow them. In the interest of economy, because we are not printing so many books as formerly and do not need so large a force in the folding-room, the Committee on Appropriations has reduced this appropriation from $100,000 to $50,000. Do they mean that or do they not? The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] a member of the committee, who comes in here with a different view from that expressed by the committee in their bill, and faintly advocated by the chairman, [Mr. GARFIELD,] is willing to reduce the appropriation to $30,000. Now, the committee must have reported this provision for $50,000 either upon some state of facts or upon none. I take it the committee has sufficiently reduced the amount; that if gentlemen wish to vote in the interest of economy, they go far enough in that direction by voting for this reduction of $50,000.

And let me say that though we appropriate $50,000, it is not necessary that that amount shall be expended. If we shall order books printed, as I know we shall, as we are contemplating in this very bill, we shall need these folders; and we want men to be paid for what they do. If we do not order books printed, there may be no necessity for expending this whole appropriation of $50,000. I say, therefore, that if the Committee on Appropriations have examined this subject and come to the conclusion expressed in the bill, they should stand by their bill if they expect members of the House to stand by it.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to oppose the amendment pro forma. So far as I can understand, this amendment comes in here with the approval of the Committee on Appropriations, and without any protest whatever, so far as I have been able to learn, from the Committee on Accounts. It is in the direction of economy. The gentleman from Maine tells us that if his amendment be adopted we can then well afford to reduce the appropriation from $50,000 to $30,000. I hope, therefore, the House will sustain the Committee on Appropriations in the direction of economy.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] to withdraw his amendment, that I may renew it.

Mr. MYERS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I renew it. I desire to say a word or two in reference to this whole legislation. To my mind it is the most unsatisfactory legislation in which I ever had any part. The confusion grows "worse confounded" every moment. The astonishing statement was made a moment ago by a member of the Committee on Appropriations that a large percentage of employés about this Capitol were kept here unemployed during the last recess. We are now asked by the committee to make an appropriation of $50,000, upon which the committee itself does not seem to be united. Statements have been made repeatedly by men who ought to know that the appropriation is much greater than it ought to be. Under such circumstances, Mr. Chairman, how can innocent gentlemen like myself, who are trying to do right, decide how to vote?

Charges are made (and I begin to think there is some basis for them) that there has been improper management in reference to the employés about this House. I look into this bill and I find that the salaries paid to employés about this Capitol are higher than the compensation for like services anywhere else on this broad continent; and there seem to be more of these employés than there can be any necessity for. Questions and appeals are addressed to the committee that reported the bill, and they are divided. In such a division, where, O where shall those go who desire to do exactly right on this question? Whom shall they follow? If that were a "parliamentary inquiry" I would put it to you, Mr. Chairman, and I know you would help me. I cannot understand the reasoning adopted upon these matters here. To the mind of an ordinary man it is incomprehensible how even $10,000 can be necessary for folding the few documents that we expect to send off during the next year. Gentlemen tell us that for the use of the House sixteen hundred of all our documents are printed; but there are not fifty documents like the Agricultural Report; and how much apiece would it cost to fold them if we make the appropriation here proposed?

Now, this Committee on Appropriations, before it gets the vote of a single man upon this floor for any of these appropriations—and it will certainly not get mine until I have ample information, and I am making these observations now for the purpose of eliciting that information—I say that this committee ought not to get a single vote for any one of these propositions, and will not get mine, until they show the existing necessity for each one of them, and that they have reduced the number of employés and the amount of appropriation to the lowest point and reduced the salaries to the lowest figure. I voted like a man to take $800 off my salary in voting for the bill abolishing the mileage system which was passed by the House this morning, and I am patriotic enough to apply the same kind of treatment to those who do not happen to be, as I am, a member on this floor. I am willing to say, in reference to every employé about the House connected with legislation, that I will deal fairly by all; but gentlemen who are the leaders of this House, skilled in the history of parliamentary matters, and who have gone through in detail with all the arguments of this bill, should be able to tell me plainly and distinctly, "We need so many men in that office; we need so many men in that room; and we ought to pay them so much." Until they do give us that information they will not get my vote, as I have already stated, although I do not know that will make much difference, because I was not long in discovering while we make most tremendous professions here in the way of economy we do not perform worth a cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. This morning I insisted on a division, and I pressed it even at the risk of being considered a little foolish, perhaps; but I did desire to see whether the men who are employed in service here would be declared to be worth infinitely more than men anywhere else in the country. I can go into my city and find just as good men as are employed in clerkships here—just as good as are employed in any place about this House of Representatives, and get them for 50 per cent. less than you pay them here. But you cannot go to my city and get a man to take a similar position there at the salary I am now coming here for. We have to work for no honor and get no pay.

Mr. LAMPORT. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the men in his city to whom he refers are the men who cried out for "bread or blood?"

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not see the point of the gentleman's question. My constituents are willing to work, the people where I live are willing to work, for less pay than these men who are employed about this Capitol. I protest, I protest in the name of the very men he speaks of here as crying for "bread or blood" in my city. But of course there was no such cry; that is all in my eye.

Mr. LAMPORT. It was so reported in the papers.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I say I protest in their name against this discrimination here. There is no discrimination in our favor. The members on this floor do not get any pay above the average of men employed in the cities and towns from which they come. I protest against the discrimination in favor of the employés of this House and against those employed in important services elsewhere. I protest against being asked to vote for a bill making appropriations in reference to which charges have been made by my political opponents that there are embraced in them things which are all wrong; and until the chairman and the members of the Committee on Appropriations agree among themselves to point out the existing necessity for these appropriations, and as to the number of these employés and the amount to be paid, I shall vote against them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I sympathize deeply with my friends in the West, but I do not know there is balm in any Gilead for them. The Committee on Appropriations have had no divisions on this point, nor have I seen any sign of any division on the general question. That committee brought in the bill, and as far as we have gone have reduced appropriations. The appropriation for the employés of our own House has been cut down. We have taken from our own salaries $750,000. That has been already passed. To-day by an overwhelming vote we have cut off, if the bill should become a law, $130,000 in the way of mileage. In addition we have just now on the whole subject of the employés of this House, other than the members, made a reduction of $47,170 less than the same officers received last year, and less by $183,193 than the estimate for this year. Still the gentleman is not happy; still the gentleman thinks there is trouble in the camp and difficulty in the Committee on Appropriations.

On the very subject now before the committee on which the House and the Senate have appropriated $100,000 a year for the last three years the Committee on Appropriations have gone over it carefully and cut it down to $50,000 instead of $100,000 and have recommended no other sum, except one member of the committee who thought it possible we might not need all that. We thought it was wiser to appropriate enough against uncertain contingencies and as to what amount of printing would be ordered, rather than be compelled to bring in a deficiency bill hereafter.

That is all there is about the merits of the vote. The question of consolidating the two organizations of folding-rooms into one is a very plain business proposition. The committee, as a committee, did not make it, for the simple reason that it would have been ruled out of order if the point of order was made on it. But we saw that the spirit of the Committee of the Whole was in favor of something like that, and my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maine, very properly offered a proposition to consolidate. We do not care whether the consolidation is under the Door-keeper or under the Clerk. But to have it under one head instead of two is wise and economical. I hope we shall have a vote in favor of the consolidation.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. In saying "we have reduced our own salaries and cut off the mileage," does the gentleman mean to say "we," the Committee on Appropriations, in this bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. I was speaking of a wider "we;" I mean we, this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendments. The Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 177, after the word "dollars" add the following:
Provided, That after the 30th of June, 1874, all the folding of the House shall be done through the Clerk of the House, and the two folding-rooms now existing shall be united under that officer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] renews the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maine by striking out the word "Clerk" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Door-keeper." The question will be first on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to ask a question. Would the amendment to the amendment make the law exactly as it now is by placing these services under the charge of the Door-keeper?

Mr. GARFIELD. No; it consolidates under one officer services which are now under the control of two officers.

Mr. MYERS. As I understand it, these rooms are now under the charge of the Door-keeper and one under the charge of the Clerk. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois would put both under the Door-keeper, while that of the gentleman from Maine would put both under the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated correctly the effect of the amendments.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 70, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, called for tellers.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WARD of Illinois and Mr. HALE of Maine.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 73.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 32, noes 83; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HALE of Maine.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If this amendment is lost does it leave the law precisely as it is at present?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not myself call for a further count.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on a further count. And I ask that the amendment as amended be again read.

The amendment as amended was again read.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that since the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been amended, the gentleman from Maine has become opposed to his own amendment, or else the tellers are both on the same side.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 75.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not insist on a further count.

So the amendment as amended was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I now renew my amendment to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$30,000;" so it will read, "for folding documents, including pay of folders in the folding-rooms and materials, $30,000."

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont by making the amount $25,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire just to say in one word that the appropriation for this service in 1860 was $30,000, and that in 1866 it was $30,000. I have selected these two years, one being before and the other after the war.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman should remember that that was under the franking privilege, and now we have none.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move to amend by making the amount $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Only one amendment to the amendment can be received.

Mr. RANDALL. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL'S amendment as modified, making the amount $15,000, it was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now renew my amendment to the amendment to make the amount $25,000.

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL'S amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 59, noes 61; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. MYERS and Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I make the point of order, that the Chair has announced the number of members who have voted on either side, and that one-fifth of a quorum of this House has not asked for tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire further reply than has been given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 47.

Mr. MYERS. I do not insist on a further count.

So Mr. RANDALL'S amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont as amended, the amount of $25,000 having been inserted.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 81, noes 45.

So the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WADDELL. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; let us go on a little longer, and then I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. WADDELL. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MCKEE. I move to insert after the paragraph ending on line 177, providing for the folding of documents, including pay of folders, &c., the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in paying over twenty folders.

Mr. HOSKINS. I rise to a point of order; I submit that that amendment is liable to the objection that it changes existing laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, is in the nature of a limitation upon the appropriation. The Chair thinks that it is in order, and overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS.]

Mr. MCKEE. I desire to state in a few words the reason why I offer this amendment. We cannot be economical, neither can the Door-keeper be economical, so long as everybody wants to put John Jones, or Tom Smith, or Dick Somebody, into the folding-room. The trouble with the folding-room is that it has been made a refuge for men who want places and have not been able to get them elsewhere. When a member cannot get a man a consulship he sends him into the folding-room; when he cannot get a man appointed minister to Mexico, he sets him to work folding documents here.

Now, sir, I am opposed to this thing of providing places here for men who are desirous of serving Uncle Sam, and I think we had better restrict the number of folders to twenty.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Does the gentleman know how many are now employed?

Mr. MCKEE. There are now employed under the name of folders—I do not know how many are employed under other names—fifty-six persons. Now that is about one folder to every three or four Congressmen. We must keep them very busy. I do not know what they are doing down there; but I tell you that it is not necessary that we should have so many. Gentlemen near me say that if I will sit down they will carry my amendment, so I will say no more.

The question was taken on Mr. MCKEE'S amendment; and on a division there were ayes 82, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move to amend by adding to the amendment just adopted the following:

That the twenty folders shall be from Maine and Mississippi.

Mr. SPEER. I make the point of order that that changes existing law.

Mr. MCKEE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "Maine."

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. What existing law does the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee change?

Mr. SPEER. There is no existing law requiring them to be appointed from those two States, although the fact may be that they are.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not well taken.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move as an amendment to the amendment to strike out "Maine and Mississippi," and insert in lieu thereof "the district represented by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MCKEE."]

Mr. SENER. There is already an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. MCKEE. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope these frivolous proceedings will go no further. Let us get on with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] insist on his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HOSKINS. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For packing-boxes, $3,020.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to strike out that clause. We have started this morning for purposes of economy. We have repealed the law providing for mileage for members. Now, I am told—as a new member I know nothing at all about it—that when the session closes we all have little boxes made down-stairs here, and this appropriation of $3,020 is to pay for them.

A MEMBER. Each member has three boxes.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. So far as I am concerned, I did not come here for the purpose of being put in a box; I do not desire to go home in a box; in fact, if possible, I want to go home about the same way I came, and I should like very well to draw mileage if it were possible. But, inasmuch as we are economical, and have to-day been voting for the purpose of cutting down the pay of the one-armed soldiers around this Capitol, and have for the most part in fact cut down the pay of the employés of this House, let us now go right to the root of the matter and cut down our own compensation where we have an opportunity to do it.

So far as I am concerned, as a member of this House I want the people to know distinctly every dollar of money that I draw as a member; and I do not propose to have boxes charged against me by the people of my district as a part of the perquisites I have received as a member of Congress. I hope the House will strike out this appropriation, for the same reason that we have voted to cut off mileage this morning and that we voted to reduce our salaries, for the reason that every Congressman is receiving a great deal more money than he ought to have.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I would ask the gentleman if he has yet got his boxes?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. No; and I do not want any boxes.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. COBB, of Kansas; and there were—ayes 47, noes 73; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN put the question on ordering tellers; and only 8 members voted therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas raised the point of order that tellers could not be ordered unless one-fifth of a quorum voted therefor. Tellers, therefore, are not ordered; and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state his point of order.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. It is that a quorum did not vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, if made in time, would have been well taken. The Clerk will continue the reading.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, (standing in the middle aisle in front of the Clerk's desk.) I raise the point of order——

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] must address the Chair from his own seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] is well taken. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] will please resume his seat.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I raise the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please resume his place.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, returned to his seat.

Mr. RICE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] has a right to speak in front of the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order is well taken; but the gentleman from Kansas was in the middle aisle, some fifteen feet from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I desire to say with reference to the gentleman from Kansas——

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, (from his seat.) I ask consent of the committee——

Mr. MYERS. I think the gentleman from Kansas should be allowed an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. And he will get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks consent to be heard.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. It is a question of but little importance to me as an individual; but it is of some importance to this House. I desired to raise the point of order that a quorum did not vote upon my amendment, and that the Chair, by his hasty way of refusing tellers, gave me no opportunity to call for them. I now desire to call for tellers upon my amendment, for the purpose of vindicating my right and that of every other member of this committee to be heard, and to have any amendment he may submit fairly tested.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will bear witness that the Chair has taken exceeding pains to be not only courteous but impartial toward every member of this committee. Before the point of order was raised the count had been announced by the Chair, the Clerk had been directed to proceed with the reading, a gentleman had risen to move an amendment to the succeeding paragraph, and had been recognized by the Chair. With entire courtesy toward the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] and toward all the committee the Chair has simply desired to expedite the business of this committee, as seemed to be the wish of members. The Clerk will continue the reading.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to a question of order. My question of order is that at the moment the Chair announced the result of the vote the gentleman from Kansas was on his feet, manifestly seeking to call for tellers.

Mr. McNULTA. That is clearly so.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the gentleman from Kansas should certainly have the benefit of the ordinary rules of the House in testing the sense of the committee upon his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had not, and could not have, the slightest inclination to prevent any count that might be desired. If the members of the committee desire to have a count by tellers——

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the count be taken by tellers, and then I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to another question of order. It is that, according to the vote as announced by the Chair, there was no quorum voting. It was, therefore, the duty of the Chair, under the rule and without any requirement on the part of the committee, to appoint tellers and order the vote to be taken by them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will refer to the record and ascertain whether a quorum voted or not. The fact is that so much noise was made at the time that it was impossible for the Chair to tell whether a quorum voted or not. The Clerk will refer to the record and inform the Chair whether there was or not a quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. The question turns upon whether a further count is asked; not upon whether a quorum voted or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk who has the record of the vote has left the Hall. The Chair, however, is willing to accept the statement of gentlemen that a quorum did not vote, and will take the sense of of the committee upon ordering tellers.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise the point of order that it is not competent for the Chair to take the sense of the committee upon ordering tellers, but it is the duty of the Chair under the rule to order tellers.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Can a second question of order be entertained until the one I have raised has been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether a quorum voted or not.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understood the Chair to state that he would accept the statement of any gentleman to that effect. I make the statement that a quorum did not vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair accepts the statement of the gentleman, and will order tellers. The gentleman from Kansas, Mr. COBB, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. HALE, will act as tellers. [After a pause.] The record has been brought to the attention of the Chair, showing that a quorum did not vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas. It is therefore the duty of the Chair to order tellers, which he has done, and they will take their places.

The committee proceeded to vote; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 62, noes 71; no quorum voting.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, (one of the tellers.) I do not ask for a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has seemed to be desirous of taking the vote by tellers, and the Chair will insist upon the vote being so taken. If no quorum shall vote the Chair will direct the roll to be called, and report the absentees to the House.

The count was completed; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 81.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DWIGHT J. M'CANN.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2039) for the relief of Dwight J. McCann; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 16, 1874.

Prayer by the Rev. THOMAS GALLAUDET, D. D., of New York.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents resolutions from the industrial congress of the United States, in the form of a memorial, signed by its president and secretary. As the paper is short, the Chair will read it:

The following resolutions were unanimously passed by the industrial congress of the United States:

Resolved, That the industrial congress of the United States, representing the interests of the producing classes, hereby enters its protest against the extension of the currency issued by or through the influence of the national banking system, believing it to be the robber of labor and the sum of all villainies.

Resolved, That we demand the issue of a circulating medium issued directly by the Government to the people, the same to be a legal tender for debts public and private, based on the faith and resources of the country, without the intervention of the so-called national banks.

ROBERT SCHILLING,
President.

BYRON POPE, Secretary.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Lyman Guinnip, praying payment of expenses incurred on account of imprisonment through false charges of rebels during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Jesse D. Carmichael, of Indianapolis, Indiana, praying the passage of an act declaring the true intent of section 4 of the act of 1806, which provides that suits on marshal's bonds shall be commenced within six years after the right of action shall have accrued and not afterward, and praying that the limitations prescribed by that section shall apply to and include the Government; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Zanesville, Ohio, in favor of an extension of the currency; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the memorial of Hon. R. K. Scott, of South Carolina, in vindication of his administration as governor of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a communication of the Postmaster-General, addressed to Hon. J. G. CANNON, chairman sub-Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives, transmitting additional information relative to the prepayment of postage on newspapers and other matter of the second class, &c.; and it was ordered to be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Martha C. Vaughan and Louisa Jackman be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I give notice that on Tuesday next I shall call up the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866, and ask the Senate to proceed with its consideration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of James T. Barclay, praying for the adoption by the mint of the United States of his improvements to prevent the abrasion or counterfeiting of coin, reported adversely thereon, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 2878) to amend the twenty-fifth section of the coinage act of 1873, and the bill (H. R. No. 2876) to amend the coinage act of 1873, reported adversely thereon, and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of James C. Cook, of Bridgeport, Connecticut, praying for the extension of his patent improvement in the manufacture of webbing, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Wethered, of Maryland, praying for the extension of his patent for an improvement in carding, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2787) to provide for the sale of the present United States marine hospital and site and the purchase of a new site and erection thereon of a new marine hospital, in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri requesting the establishment of a daily mail each way over the Cairo, Arkansas and Texas Railroad, between Cairo, Illinois, and Poplar Bluff, Missouri, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be transmitted to the Postmaster-General; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2667) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather authentic information as to the condition and importance of the fur trade in the Territory of Alaska, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1719) granting a pension to Ezra H. Foster, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2791) granting a pension to Franklin Stoner, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1439) granting a pension to John Folger, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of G. M. Grund, John Heller, and others, members of the German Evangelical church of Martinsburgh, West Virginia, praying compensation for the destruction of their church during the late war by fire while occupied and used by the United States troops as their quarters, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 709) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical church at Martinsburgh, West Virginia.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1866) granting a pension to Dennis McCarthy, a soldier of the Mexican war, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 599) for the relief of Ada H. McDonald, of Nashville, Tennessee, have directed me to report that it appears upon investigation that on March 3, 1873, by special act, the petitioner was placed on the pension-roll, and therefore to ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1835) granting a pension to Mary A. Lowe, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2679) granting a pension to George Dayspring, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2217) granting a pension to Henry Bruckner, late a private of Company F, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Elijah Laws, chief engineer of the United States Navy, praying compensation as such, of which he was deprived by the act of July 25, 1866, which changed first assistant engineers from warrant to commissioned officers, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 710) for the relief of E. Laws, chief engineer United States Navy.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STOCKTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire as to the expediency of erecting in the city of Washington the naval monument now in process of construction by Franklin Simmons, reported a bill (S. No. 711) providing for the completion and location of the naval monument; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 482) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Willamette River at Salem, in the State of Oregon, reported it without amendment.

BOARD OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2867) to authorize the use of certain unexpended balance for payment of expenses of board of Indian commissioners, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the action of the House. I ask for the present consideration of the bill, as there is a pressing necessity for it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to use, for the payment of the expenses of the board of Indian commissioners, for the year ending June 30, 1874, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for that purpose by the act of May 29, 1872; that unexpended balance being $8,061.71.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOONER CHINA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of the owners of the schooner China asking for the change of its name, to report a bill and recommend its passage. I ask unanimous consent for its passage now. It is very brief.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 708) to change the name of the schooner China was read three times, and passed. The bill grants authority to the owners of the schooner China, built at Trenton, Michigan, in 1873, and registered at Detroit, to change its name to Canton.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. SCOTT. If there are no more reports of committees, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 350) in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the House of Representatives is a substitute for the Senate bill and the Committee on Finance report amendments to the House amendment.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the motion before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the motion to postpone been put? The bill was read for information, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been read for information. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to its present consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to that. I should like to have that printed. If I understand it—I have never seen it—the proposition is to pay some million or two of dollars for a lawsuit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator objects the Chair will put the question.

Mr. SCOTT. I inquired of the Chair if there were any other reports of committees, and I then moved to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning-hour business has not yet been concluded. Bills and resolutions have not been called for. Therefore, a single objection will put this matter over at present.

Mr. SCOTT. Will not the Senator consent that it be taken up subject to the morning business?

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to resist its being taken up when the time comes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan objects.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to pass by the morning business and take this bill up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is out of order until the morning business is disposed of.

Mr. SCOTT. As soon as the morning business is disposed of I will move to proceed to its consideration.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 712) to enable disabled soldiers to receive money commutations upon orders for artificial limbs that are dated before June 16, 1870; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 713) making additions to the fifteenth section of the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 714) to authorize the Attorney-General of the United States to inquire into the condition and title to the lands of the ex-mission of San Buenaventura, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution for the purpose of reference, which I ask to have read at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) recognizing the independence of Cuba; and it was read twice, and is as follows:

Whereas it is the clear and undoubted right of any American colony to sever its connection with the mother country and establish itself as an independent nation whenever the good of its people requires it; and whereas the people of Cuba have declared themselves free and independent of the government of Spain, have established a government for themselves, and abolished negro slavery, and for more than five years have successfully resisted all the efforts of Spain to reduce them to submission and re-establish the condition of negro slavery in that island; and whereas the war between Spain and Cuba has been, and is now being, conducted with a degree of barbarity shocking to all Christendom, and there is no reasonable prospect that Spain will ever be able to re-establish dominion over the people of Cuba; and whereas in consequence of the proximity of the seat of war to the United States, the war has been and is injurious to the people of the United States, and it is evident that a prolongation of the contest will result only in great suffering and bloodshed, to be followed by the ultimate recognition of the independence of Cuba by Spain herself: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it has become the duty of the United States to recognize Cuba as one of the independent nations of the earth.

And be it further resolved, That the United States will observe strict neutrality between the contending parties during the further prosecution of the war; and will accord to each of them belligerent rights and equal privileges and advantages in all ports and places within the United States.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business seems to be concluded.

Mr. SCOTT and Mr. WINDOM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 655) to enable the Mennonites from Russia to effect permanent settlement on the public lands of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would have recognized the Senator from Pennsylvania who first rose to his feet but for the fact that he supposed the Senator from Minnesota rose with morning business. The Chair will therefore recognize the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WINDOM. My notice antedates that of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because I gave notice two days ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot act on the notice of the Senator, as the Senator from Pennsylvania rose to obtain the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not going to be the sole objector to taking up this bill. I am not going to object on my own behalf at all. I rise, however, to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is a little premature to ask us to take up this matter now in the morning hour. The report was made yesterday, or rather it was printed yesterday. I have read it myself, having been able this morning to read it in a street-car, as one can read a somewhat long report in such a place; and but for that I should not have been able to look into it. I imagine that not one in ten of the Senators present has either read or had the opportunity to read the report. It is an important matter; and I suggest to my friend that if at an early time, to-morrow, or next day, or whenever he pleases, he moves to take up the bill, it will afford a little better opportunity than has been given now for understanding it. Certainly there can be no choice of days between to-day and to-morrow or next day, so that I suggest to him, not by way of making an objection, that it would be well to invite the attention of the Senate to it for at least twenty-four hours before its consideration is moved, particularly as this motion is made in the morning hour with the curtailment of discussion which is necessitated by that time.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no other desire in relation to this bill than to discharge the duty imposed upon me by the Finance Committee, and it was the unanimous opinion of that committee that early action should be had upon this bill. It has already elicited some discussion in the Senate, and does present the question of whether the public interest should longer be delayed for want of action upon the bill. It is true the report was made on Tuesday and the printed report laid upon the desks of members yesterday. As to the suggestion of the Senator from New York that probably not ten members have read it, I may answer that if they do not read it when it is laid on their desks, the probability is that not more than ten will read it until it is called up for action. That is our usual practice, that unless we read a report when it is put on our tables, we never read it until it comes up; and if we are to wait until everybody reads it, the probability is that that would be the most effectual way of defeating action on the bill.

I have discharged the duty imposed on me, having made the report of moving to take up the question in the Senate. Its nature and importance are sufficiently understood to have the Senate vote intelligently on whether they will proceed to consider it or not. I think it is highly important that it should have early consideration and early action.

Mr. CONKLING. I learn something from the Senator from Pennsylvania almost always when he rises to his feet. I have done it this morning. I learn that unless we take up the file of reports, which this morning is unusually small, consisting perhaps of not more than ten or twelve reports, and read them as they are laid on our desks, we are not likely afterward to resort to them at all.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. SCOTT. Until the measure is called up.

Mr. CONKLING. "Until it is called up," the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Pennsylvania add. Had I not heard that, I should have supposed that, particularly in respect of an important bill, if a Senator gave notice twenty-four or forty-eight hours in advance that he intended to move to take it up and invited the attention of Senators to the subject, at least ten Senators would be likely to cast their eye upon it. While the Senator from Pennsylvania was expressing himself, my friend on my right, [Mr. HOWE,] whose diligence in reading everything we might all imitate, inquired of me whether there was any report in this case except the bill. It is only then at this moment that that Senator has learned for the first time that there is a printed report here; and yet the Senator from Pennsylvania thinks the Senate is just as ready—I understand him to say in effect—to proceed with this measure now as it will be to-morrow morning or the next day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ought to apologize myself for not having seen this measure at all, but my attention has not been called to it until this bill has been talked about. I certainly have no prejudice to influence my judgment. The only reason I should desire a little opportunity to examine it is that I am not well enough informed on the subject to vote upon the question. The difficulties attending the measure as it came from the House and the report which accompanied it rendered it sufficiently doubtful in the estimation of the Senate as to what ought to be done to induce the Senate to send the matter back to a committee for more thorough investigation and report precisely as to what we should do. I hardly think that the Senate feels itself in a condition at the present moment to take this up in the morning hour without having had a better opportunity to examine the facts of the case. I only speak for myself; but I should be very glad indeed if the Senator who has charge of the bill might feel that it was consistent with his duty and the importance of the subject to allow it to go over to another day; fix to-morrow, if you choose, or any day outside of the regular business before the Senate when this measure can be fully considered. I hope the friends of this measure will not feel constrained to press it, as they very properly do; may accord so much to those who really desire to know what this is as to vote understandingly and fairly about it; and I am not in that condition, I confess.

Mr. STEVENSON. I respect the conscientious scruples of the Senator from Maine, and I can assure him that the friends of this bill do not desire that it should be pressed without a full discussion. But it is a very important and vital measure, in which the people of the entire Ohio Valley are deeply interested. For thirty years the commerce of the Ohio River has been subjected to the imposition of an onerous tax, under which the people of some six or seven States like Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Tennessee, and others are becoming restless and impatient. Congress and the Legislatures of Kentucky and Indiana have been actively trying for not less than fifteen or twenty years to get rid of this burden——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that debate on the merits is not in order.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not going to debate the merits. I say I hope the question will now be taken up, when the Senator from Maine and every other Senator will hear the reasons for prompt action on this bill and will have an opportunity to examine its provisions and then vote upon it. We can take up the report this morning, and if we are not able to dispose of it we can continue its consideration until it is disposed of. This is the continued usage of the Senate. You remember, sir, that the bill from this same committee in regard to the examination of the alcoholic liquor traffic was discussed during the morning for several days. Now prompt action is exceedingly important. Let us, then, take this report up and make progress. If there are any objections to the details of the bill when they shall have been explained by the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has charge of it, those objections can readily be removed. If we do not get through with it to-day, let us continue it every morning until the subject shall be fully discussed and disposed of. The commerce of the Ohio River will be then relieved from a taxation which has been demonstrated to have been absolutely so oppressive for twenty years past, and in the repeal and removal of which so many States are directly interested.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask my honorable friend if he thinks it is quite fair to take up so important a bill as this in the morning hour at the expense of the Calendar, on which some progress can be made? If the morning hour is used up in this way, we shall never reach a great many private bills on the Calendar.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have a very ready answer to the Senator from Maine. I will urge the disposal of this bill now, and I will come here next Saturday, or any other Saturday, and take up the Calendar and go through it; but as the precedent has been set in regard to other bills, which I propose to extend to the Louisville and Portland Canal, I hope it will be considered.

Mr. HOWE. I did not know that this bill had been reported back to the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Maine and others that they have not looked into the report that has been made on this subject, I feel disposed to yield this morning, with notice that I will endeavor to-morrow, or if it be not opportune then at the first practicable moment, to call up the bill for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. HOWE. I wanted to say a word myself, and I thought I had the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall not deprive the Senator of the opportunity of saying it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania who withdrew his motion.

Mr. HOWE. The Chair had some right to understand me as yielding; but I really was not asked to yield and I did not say I would yield; but the first thing I knew the Senator from Pennsylvania was speaking and I was not. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is equivalent, as the Chair understands, to yielding.

Mr. HOWE. I think under the practice of the Senate it is equivalent to yielding.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. HOWE. I propose to go on speaking, and under the rule I think the Senator from Minnesota will consider that he has yielded to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota is not entitled to debate anything at present, there being nothing before the Senate. The Senator from Minnesota can make his motion.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania not to withdraw his motion at present.

Mr. SCOTT. The Chair misunderstood me. I said I felt, in view of what had been said, disposed to yield; but I only wished an explanation to be made as evincing my desire, my intention, after the Senator from Wisconsin should have yielded the floor, to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was mistaken. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. HOWE. Now we are all right. [Laughter.] Mr. President, I want to say for myself that according to the view I had—a darkened view, I have no doubt—of the merits of the bill to which the Senator from Pennsylvania asked the attention of the Senate, there is no chore to which I think the Senate ought to pay so early and so undivided attention as this very one, until it is disposed of, because as I understand it it asks for nothing in the world except that the Secretary of War shall be directed to take possession of a work in which the United States have invested several million dollars and which is paying a revenue of about a quarter of a million a year and paying it into the pockets of five men that you do not know a thing about and who have invested in the aggregate $500 in the work.

Mr. SCOTT. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year is the revenue.

Mr. HOWE. About a thousand dollars a day. That is all we are asked to do. We have paid the money freely year after year to the amount of millions, and nobody has been scared; but now when we are called upon to take possession of the work into which we have put so much, we are all frightened. Mr. President, for myself I would prefer to see the Secretary of War instructed this morning early, before one o'clock, to take possession of it, and made to take possession of it within twenty-four hours from this time. Then, if you should ascertain afterward that you did not want to keep the work, I would give it up after I had considered that question; but you can consider that question just as well while you have possession of the work as you can while these five men have possession of the work. That is all I wanted to say.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, if I were of the opinion that before one o'clock we could direct the Secretary of War to take possession of this work, I certainly would not do what I am about to do; but so well satisfied am I of the merits of the application which we now make to pass this bill, that, acting upon the principle upon which a lawyer acts when he takes time to shorten his speech, I am satisfied that by giving those who have not looked into this measure until to-morrow to look at the report we shall get action much earlier than by consuming the morning hour in discussing the question whether we will take it up or not. Therefore, with the notice that I will come in to-morrow and seek to have action on the bill, I yield to the suggestion made by those who I know are not unfriendly to it, to let it go over until to-morrow morning. I therefore withdraw my motion.

MENNONITE SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WINDOM. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 655) to enable the Mennonites of Russia to effect permanent settlement on the public lands of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. As the morning hour has nearly expired and this bill has been discussed somewhat before, and I regard a vote as more important than any speech I can make, I will, after making a single remark in reference to some objections made the other day, yield the floor to any other Senator who desires to say anything.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to the vote being taken now.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. STEWART, which was to strike out all after the word "that" in the first line of the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and insert the following:

Whenever a body of such persons, being heads of families or single persons over twenty-one years of age, shall, through a duly constituted and accredited agent, file with the Secretary of the Interior an application for permission to locate a portion of the public lands of the United States, accompanying such application with a list of the persons composing such body, and the quantity desired by each, the Secretary may authorize such location to be made in any land district of the United States, by giving such agent the proper certificate in writing, under seal of his office, stating that such application has been filed, and reciting the number of persons so applying and the number of acres which they may include in their claim.

SEC. 2. That any person named in the application and petition on file with the Secretary of the Interior shall have the exclusive right of entry for the period of two years from the date of filing as aforesaid upon complying with the laws of the United States existing at the date of entry.

SEC. 3. That at the expiration of the period of two years as aforesaid, all lands not entered by the parties entitled under the foregoing provisions shall be subject to the entry of any other person under the laws applicable to the same as other public lands of the United States.

SEC. 4. That no one filing shall embrace more than one township of thirty-six sections, nor shall a new filing be made until the lands of the former filing shall be exhausted.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. WINDOM. For two reasons I hope the amendment of the Senator from Nevada will be rejected. In the first place, it is substantially the same in the first section and down to the eighth section as the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands. The only changes are to strike out certain provisions prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or under his direction, to conform this bill to the existing land laws and the regulations of the Department.

The other reason is that section 4 of the amendment really defeats the object of the bill and is more objectionable on various grounds mentioned the other day than the bill itself. The bill itself provides that only one hundred thousand acres shall be withdrawn for settlement by these parties under any one application. The amendment provides that a whole township shall be withdrawn. Under the bill of the committee but thirty-two families could settle in any one place under a single withdrawal. The amendment would set aside an entire section and force one hundred and forty-four families together in a body. But the chief objection to it is that under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada no other application or reservation can be made until the entire township is taken. So we shall provide that at least one hundred and forty-four families must make application and then for two years no other application can be made. The bill provides for thirty-two families or one hundred thousand acres. The amendment is more objectionable than the bill, and will defeat the object intended. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the small remainder of the morning hour deters me from saying some things about this bill which I would say; I am not willing, however, to allow to pass unchallenged—thus far no reply has been made to them—the remarks made the other day by the honorable Senator from Connecticut not now in his seat, [Mr. FERRY.] He made objection to the bill upon a single ground. He said that allowing Mennonites, whom he seemed to think were non-combatants, to come here as proposed, would be the introduction of a body of men, who, unless they subsequently became citizens of the United States, would be forever exempt from military duty. The Senator thus affirmed, if I understood him, that a man who comes from a foreign country to this country, not as a visitor, not animo revertendi in the language of the law, but to remain, and declares his intention to become a citizen, does not thereby come to owe allegiance or military service to the government of his adoption. I wish to record my dissent from that doctrine. Time does not permit me to discuss the question; I will, however, refer to a declaration of Congress, and to declarations of Senators in past years.

In 1863 a prominent and absorbing question before the country involved the inquiry discussed by the Senator from Connecticut. Congress in that year adopted an enrollment act involving the last exercise of authority by the Government in exacting military duty, to wit, a draft; and not by accident or in haste, but upon mature consideration, the Senate framed and both Houses adopted this provision:

All able-bodied male citizens of the United States, and persons of foreign birth who shall have declared on oath their intention to become citizens under and in pursuance of the laws thereof, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, except as hereinafter excepted, are hereby declared to constitute the national forces, and shall be liable to perform military duty in the service of the United States when called out by the President for that purpose.

The competency and warrant of such a provision were topics of much discussion in the Senate. The debate is before me. I will not recite it, but I call attention to the declaration of two or three Senators. Mr. Howard, then a Senator from Michigan, doubted this right, and one or two other Senators doubted it. Mr. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, then a Senator here, expressed strongly his view that persons who had declared their intention to become citizens were, as much as citizens, subject to military duty. Mr. McDougall, then a Senator from California, for whose professional and other attainments all who knew him had much regard, in strong and unqualified language asserted the right of the Government. So did Mr. Trumbull, then a Senator from Illinois; and I find that the Senator from Wisconsin usually sitting on my right [Mr. HOWE] made this observation:

With regard to the first part of the amendment—

It was that which related to the class of persons in question.

I will say, now that I am up, that I really hope it will be adopted. I cannot conceive that there is any rational doubt of the authority of the Government to require the assistance of this class of persons, since they come here, and under the sanction of our laws claim all the privileges of citizens.

Passing over much that was said to the same effect I call the attention of the Senate to the vote upon the amendment, which was to the point I am discussing:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Arnold, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Latham, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Rice, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson.

The nays were but nine. In that vote I understand the Senate to have asserted the doctrine which I will endeavor briefly to state. When a subject of a foreign government comes here to remain, the first question likely to arise in his case touches the right of expatriation. Whoever makes choice of a new government as his own, acts on his right to dissolve his allegiance to his native land. On this question the attitude of our Government has long been unqualified. This is shown by the position we held in the case of Martin Koszta, who, although not a citizen, an Austrian who had only declared his intention, was treated in his right to protection by the United States as if he were a citizen; and Captain Ingraham went to the verge of force in asserting his immunity from the authority of Austria.

The treaty-making powers, nearly all of them, Russia I believe being an exception still, have recently by formal treaty relinquished all claim to dispute the option of one who renouncing his first allegiance, seeks another country as the land of his adoption. So far the country whence he comes is a party in interest the next stage excludes the foreign country, and relates to us and to the new-comer. In respect to the relations between the new-comer and his adopted government this may be said: Having declared his intention to become a citizen, having waived whatever rights he had otherwise, having entitled himself to the protection of the newly adopted government, the equivalent stated by all the publicists in respect of military allegiance has been rendered. The reason why you, Mr. President, owe military allegiance to your government is that it is the return you are bound to pay for the protection you receive. So with every man who comes here declaring his intention, as much the day before as the day after his citizenship becomes consummate.

So, Mr. President, I cannot agree with the Senator from Connecticut that the persons referred to in the pending bill or any other persons coming from a foreign country and declaring, as the bill requires them to declare, as condition precedent to enjoying it, their intention to become citizens of the United States, would be or could be exempt from the duty to perform military service.

Before taking my seat I will refer to another matter mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut.

I think it is true of those to whom the bill applies that beyond the reason assigned by the Senator from Connecticut, namely, their indisposition to war, their convictions of conscience making them non-combatants, they contend that they settled upon the shores of the Black Sea on condition that they should never be called upon by the Russian government to bear arms in its behalf. The Senator who reports the bill will know more certainly than I whether I am right in this respect; but I understand they contend that the requisition made by Russia for military service violates the condition on which they hold their lands and on which they became domiciled within the Empire of Russia.

Mr. WINDOM. Right at that point, if the Senator will allow me, I will make a statement which occurred to me the other day.

Russia has not yet made that requisition, but has given these people notice that in 1881 they will be required to perform all the duties of Russian citizens, which include military service. They are not required to perform it now, but if they remain till that time they will be.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has been kind enough to call my attention to an act of Congress passed the 27th of July, 1868, which again asserts the American doctrine of expatriation:

Therefore be it enacted, &c.—

After making a recital touching the right of expatriation—

That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

I think we must be held committed legislatively and politically to the doctrine that the Mennonites and all other persons coming here and declaring their intention to become citizens thereby come to owe to us the same allegiance which they will owe when their citizenship shall become consummate.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I desire to state, in response to the Senator from New York, a fact that appeared before the committee. I was not in committee at the time they decided to report the bill before the Senate; but I know what the grievance of these people is. They were invited to the Black Sea predicated on their being released forever from military service. Their grievance is that now they are called upon to perform military service under the laws of the empire. The empire is giving them until 1881 in which either to assent to the laws of the empire or remove to some other country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana, on which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the pending order be laid aside informally, that the Senate may complete the bill which was pending during the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that course? The Chair hears none; and the bill (S. No. 655) to enable the Mennonites from Russia to effect permanent settlement on the public lands of the United States is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that the original bill is well designed for the purpose intended. I think there is more of it than there is any necessity for, and that it involves principles which are very objectionable. I think we can accomplish the real purpose in view much more directly and without so far departing from our land system as that bill does.

The first section provides for the application to the Secretary of the Interior and the furnishing of parties with a certificate to be filed in a local land office for the purpose of obtaining a withdrawal of the lands. The second section provides—

That upon presentation of the certificate aforesaid to the register of any land district, such agent as aforesaid shall be permitted to locate in a compact body any tract of unappropriated public land not mineral, and not exceeding the amount of one hundred and sixty acres, held at the minimum price, or eighty acres held at the double minimum price, for each person composing such body of individuals named in the said petition and application.

He locates for each individual; it is a very bad principle to allow public land to be located by an agent.

Provided, That no prior right of any person under existing laws shall be prejudiced by this act.

There is no necessity for this second section. If the lands are held open in a body, these Mennonites can go to them and select them themselves and do it in their own names when they get here. It involves complications which will be inconsistent with the section which follows for throwing them open to settlement in case they are not taken. It is unnecessary machinery. There is a good deal of clerical work and expense connected with these locations, whereas there need not be a cent of expense in executing the law if they simply file a certificate setting aside for a limited period of time a quantity of land for them to settle upon and then let them settle upon it just as other settlers do. There is no necessity for getting up a large account with each person and locating his land by an agent before he gets here. He may never come. If you hold it open, all the purpose will be accomplished.

SEC. 3. That such location shall be made by filing with the register a declaratory statement, describing the lands by sectional subdivision, township, and range, and the payment to the receiver of fees at the rate of one dollar, each, to the register and receiver for each one hundred and sixty acres embraced in the application, to be accounted for as other fees and allowances, and subject to the restrictions under existing laws as to maximum compensation of those officers.

There is no necessity for all that. Let the parties come and locate and pay the same fees as others when they come.

And upon receipt of such fees, the receiver shall issue his receipt therefor, setting forth the fact of such declaratory statement having been filed, giving the number of the same, and the description of the land, and acknowledging the said payment of the fees as aforesaid; which receipt shall be delivered to such agent, and shall be his voucher for the filing of the declaratory statement and payment of the fees aforesaid.

That is all unnecessary. Then:

SEC. 4. That the register shall forward to the General Land Office, as a portion of his monthly returns, a duly certified abstract of the declaratory statement, in the same manner as similar returns are rendered in pre-emption cases, to be entered upon the books of the General Land Office.

That is all unnecessary. A party may never come having all that done by an agent, when the party himself when he does come may enter it under the general law.

SEC. 5. That any person named in the application and petition on file with the Secretary of the Interior, or, if he be dead, his legal representatives, shall have the exclusive right of entry for the period of two years from the date of filing as aforesaid, under the laws of the United States existing at the date of entry, of a tract of land embraced in said declaratory statement, not exceeding the quantity named in the original application and petition, as the amount desired by such person, and in no case exceeding one hundred and sixty acres of minimum or eighty acres of double minimum lands.

I do not see any propriety in allowing this declaratory statement to be filed by an agent. Suppose a party for whose benefit it is designed should die before coming to this country, is it to be open for his heirs? If he dies and never comes to this country, there is no propriety in having any land entered for him. That only complicates it, and adds to the difficulty. Then the sixth section is—

SEC. 6. That all questions of priority arising between actual settlers shall be adjusted under existing rules.

Of course that would be so. There is no use in making such a provision, because they will have to come in as other actual settlers. The seventh section is very well:

SEC. 7. That at the expiration of the period of two years, as aforesaid, all lands not entered by the parties entitled under the foregoing provisions shall be subject to the entry of any other person under the laws applicable to the same as other public lands of the United States.

That section is right enough. It ought to be so. I desire now to modify my amendment by adding to it. I think the Senator from Minnesota will recognize the propriety of it if he will think about it a little more. I take the first section of the bill down to "and location to be made as hereinafter provided," and say "that upon the filing of the certificate in the local land office;" that is to say, he goes to the Secretary of the Interior, makes his application, and he gives him a certificate to go and locate; he knows where the land is that he wants—"upon the filing of his certificate in the local land office designated therein, shall be reserved for the purposes of this act."

That is all; a mere reservation simply for the purposes of this act. Then there is no need of entering the lands until the parties come here to enter. Then I say—

That any person named in the application and petition on file with the Secretary of the Interior shall have the exclusive right of entry for the period of two years from the date of filing as aforesaid upon complying with the laws of the United States existing at the date of entry.

Then their rights are all reserved by the original application which names them; the land in a body is withdrawn for them and they have for two years the exclusive right to come and enter. There is no necessity for having land entered for them until they come here; but the exclusive right is reserved for them. It will be just as satisfactory to them; it will be just as high evidence that they have a right to come and take land and will at the same time avoid the expense of having it entered by an agent and complicating it with a system of laws, which is a great innovation on the pre-emption system.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator will allow me, as I do not desire to make any speech in reply, I will say that I took the precaution under the instructions of the committee to go to the General Land Office and consult them in reference to the machinery of this bill, and the bill as it stands reported was prepared at the Land Office. It is possible that they do not understand what their present machinery is as well as we do without investigation; but I thought it the better way to trust to their judgment so that the bill should conform to their existing machinery. I do not see any special objection to what the Senator says, nor do I see that he makes any point against the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I say this is adding to the present machinery. I do not believe in passing laws for the administration of that office which shall add one additional item to the present machinery where it is not necessary, where the law is plain to all the world and well understood. The seventh section of this bill provides for these lands being public lands if not appropriated. Then the fourth section of my amendment, which accomplishes the purpose, is:

SEC. 4. That no one filing shall embrace more than one township of thirty-six sections, nor shall a new filing be made until the lands of the former filing shall be exhausted.

That may be changed to "two townships," if you wish.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator's suggestion tends to drive these people all in a body; they must go to one township in one place or one township in another. I prefer that they should not take more than one thousand acres of land or half a dozen quarter sections in a place, and hence I allow them to locate themselves wherever they please, without confining them to a single township as the Senator proposes.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to changing the amount. The point of my amendment is that there shall be no machinery about this business. If it is thought they should locate a township or half a township in a place or in a dozen different places, I have no objection to that. The simple point is that I do not want to have the lands located by an agent until the parties themselves get here. It is unnecessary machinery, and it is all an innovation on the present system.

Mr. WINDOM. The very object of locating in the way indicated by the bill is to enable them to know where their lands are and send members of their families over to improve them before the main body come, so that they may be ready for them.

Mr. STEWART. They would know exactly where their lands were without this. The lands are withdrawn for them; they are named.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is manifest that this bill has got to be considerably debated before it can pass, and I call for the regular order.

Mr. WINDOM. I move then to postpone the regular order, in order to complete the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the regular order will not be postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves to postpone the pending order and proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been before the Senate during the morning hour.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator, who commenced his speech yesterday, ought not to be postponed until the heel of the evening; he ought to have the privilege of going on now and completing his speech. I hope, therefore, the special order will not be postponed, at least not until after that speech has been delivered.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not understand, when I made this motion, that any Senator had commenced a speech on the pending bill. I do not wish to interfere with the desire of any Senator to speak. I will call up the bill in my charge to-morrow morning, if the Senate will permit.

Mr. STEWART. Perhaps that will do better, and we may agree in the mean time.

Mr. WINDOM. I will not insist on my motion to postpone the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator from Maryland to yield to me a moment to make an explanation to which I will ask the attention of the Senate.

During the debate yesterday, and in the course of the remarks that I addressed to the Senate, which I have not the opportunity of referring to this morning, as they are not published in the RECORD, I was questioned as to my knowledge of the passage of certain election laws in the State of Louisiana. I was asked whether I knew that there was more than one law passed, and I was also asked with reference to the provisions of a second law that it was alleged had been passed. The only knowledge that I had of the passage of election laws by the late Legislature was the general knowledge that some law had been passed. That knowledge was communicated to me not directly, but through a letter from the governor of the State, dated the 10th of April, 1874, which I will read:

I inclose proof copy of election law as promulgated. This, together with act 98, approved November, 1872, constitutes the election laws of the State. The law providing for entire new registration passed by last Legislature is very full and fair in all respects. The election and registration laws are as fair, I think, on the whole, as those of any State, and are satisfactory to the people.

This is signed "W. P. Kellogg."

The only conclusion that I could form was that that was the only law which the Legislature had passed, and that it was the only possible law which could be put into effect in regard to the elections in that State. I was corroborated in that idea by the tone of the public press. The latest newspapers that I have from New Orleans are of the 11th and 12th of this month, last Saturday and Sunday. The New Orleans Times, a newspaper published in opposition to the present administration in Louisiana, which I had read, commented upon this election law that is referred to by the governor. Speaking of the acts which the governor announces have been passed and which he has promulgated, it says:

That act leaves Louisiana with an election law which is generally regarded as a fair one by the people of this State; and the event may be regarded as a further concession on the part of the present administration to justice, equity, and good government.

That statement is also corroborated by the Picayune of the succeeding day, the 12th, and no knowledge appears to have reached any of these newspapers, and I reiterate again it had not reached me, nor could I find a single Louisianian in the city yesterday who had any knowledge of the second law. It appears that there was a second law, and that our friends on the other side of the Chamber were informed of it. So, after being questioned somewhat categorically on that subject and denying any knowledge of it, just after the heat of the debate, a dispatch reached me from the governor which I had read at the desk yesterday, and it occurred to me that it was a virtual and an absolute denial of the fact that any such law had passed. I find now in examining the terms of that dispatch that it is a denial of the fact that he intended to approve it, and not a denial of the fact that the law had passed. When he said it was "false," I took that to be a denial of the fact that any such law had passed; but in order to set myself right in the matter I telegraphed to him immediately, and here is a copy of my dispatch; I will read that and also his answer:

To Governor KELLOGG:

You are charged here on the floor of the Senate with holding back an election law. Was there more than one law passed, and have you signed all?

J. R. WEST.

His reply, which reached me at ten o'clock last night, I will read.

NEW ORLEANS, April 15, 1874.

There were two election acts passed. One election act amended the act 19 of session of 1873. The other election act repealed act 19 and amended act 98 of 1872. The latter was approved March 28, and has been promulgated. The former is loose and informal, and in no contingency whatever will it be approved or promulgated. This leaves the law so that police juries, except in the parish of Orleans, appoint the commissioners of election and designate the polls. No one questions fairness of this law.

W. P. KELLOGG.

Hon. J. R. WEST.

My statement, then, amounts to this: that all the testimony I was in possession of was to the effect that but one law was passed, and I got the information of the second law subsequent to my having denied the fact that any such law to my knowledge had passed. I deemed it due to myself that I should make this statement, for I do not wish to rest under the imputation of suppressing from the Senate any information that comes into my possession whether in the interest of the side I advocate or not.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I understand now from the statement of the Senator [Mr. WEST] that the information I gave to the Senate yesterday as to certain legislation in Louisiana is admitted by Governor Kellogg to be true. That information was that, although the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] had relied upon the passage of an act repealing the obnoxious one of 1873 placing the power of appointing officers of registration and election in the hands of police juries of parishes and councils of cities, yet that the Legislature passed a subsequent law repealing that to which the Senator from Indiana referred. This last act Governor Kellogg holds in his breeches pocket, and can continue to hold until the Legislature of Louisiana meets, which I believe is in January, 1875. If Congress refuses to act, why then Governor Kellogg will take this repealing act out of his pocket and approve it, restoring the act which confers upon him the same objectionable power of appointment exercised by Warmoth, and which would necessarily render any election in Louisiana next fall a shameless mockery.

When I read in support of this statement a telegram from Mr. F. C. Zacharie, of New Orleans, to Governor McEnery, the Senator from Louisiana, by way of rejoinder read to the Senate, with an air of triumph, a telegram from Governor Kellogg, as follows:

I am informed that some parties have telegraphed Senator CARPENTER and others that I have a bill before me, intending to sign and promulgate the same hereafter, which repeals the new election law. This is false. We can have a fair election under the present law. This is all republicans ask, and it is what the democracy hate.

I then pressed the Senator [Mr. WEST] to know whether such a repealing act as that cited by Mr. Zacharie had not been passed by the Legislature of Louisiana, and which was still unacted upon by Governor Kellogg, repealing the act cited by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] The Senator from Louisiana replied that if such was the case he had no knowledge of it whatever, and "I have the governor's telegram here, which I will put in my speech, saying that it is not so."

I then read a portion of a letter of Mr. Zacharie to Governor McEnery, charging that the Legislature of Louisiana had passed such an act, which was held by Governor Kellogg, and which he could approve at any time before the meeting of the Legislature in 1875.

The Senator from Louisiana replied, the only authority we have that such is the case comes from the other side of the Chamber.

The issue was then distinctly made that such a repealing act had been passed by the Louisiana Legislature, and by a statement made by me on the authority of Zacharie that such was the fact and as distinctly denied by Governor Kellogg in his telegram. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] stated that Kellogg's telegram was "a square denial" of the fact that the Legislature had passed such a repealing act on the last day of the session which he had pocketed and not signed, intending to hold it up.

Now, the Senator from Louisiana read this morning to the Senate a telegram from Governor Kellogg, received last night, which admits the passage of the repealing act as charged by me on the authority of Mr. Zacharie, and bearing on its face the implication of falsehood, fraud, and deception—not of the Senator from Louisiana, because I must suppose that his statement of his ignorance of this act was sincere, but that he had been deceived by Governor Kellogg. What are we to think of a governor who would willingly practice such deception upon his own Senator and his party friends in the United States Senate as the telegrams of Governor Kellogg convict him of? What will the country think of a government in Louisiana which requires for its support such fraudulent devices? What Senator after such an exposure would be willing or could rely upon any statement of what the future action of such an executive would be? How does the Senator from Louisiana justify the conduct of the governor to himself as reflected by his two telegrams?

I submit, Mr. President, to the Senate and to the country the unenviable position in which Governor Kellogg places himself, as disclosed by his two telegrams of last evening and this morning. It is a practical commentary upon the desperate expedients which are required to uphold him and his cause of wrong and usurpation.

Mr. CARPENTER. As my name was mentioned in connection with this matter, and I made a statement myself on the subject, I desire to say a word.

In the course of the remarks I submitted the other day, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] interrupted me and asked me if I was not aware of the repeal of the election law which had been passed by Kellogg's government, and which gave to Kellogg all the monstrous powers that Warmoth formerly possessed, and with which he controlled the State, and with which Kellogg can control the State for all time to come. The Senator wanted to know if I was not aware that that law was repealed. I told him I was not; and thereupon the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] rather tauntingly said to me that I did not seem to be aware of a good many things relating to this subject.

I recall this circumstance. A few days ago a friend of Governor Kellogg came to my office to remonstrate with me against trying to pass this bill, and insisted that the matter should be laid over until after the November election. I said to him, "That is a mere insult; Mr. Kellogg, you know, has the power to carry that State by 20,000 or 50,000; and to hold up a government of that kind without any pretense of right itself, and then let it manufacture the laws by which it can control the State forever, is an insult to common sense." "Why," said he, "what do you mean?" I told him that Mr. Kellogg's government had re-enacted the law which Warmoth had had the grace to repeal after he had used it sufficiently. He said that could not be so. I took down the volume of laws and read it to him. He said he was not aware of it, and condemned it roundly.

I am informed that he left my office and went straight to the telegraph office and telegraphed Kellogg to repeal that law at once. It is not necessary to communicate with the Legislature of that State if you want a law passed or repealed; it is simply necessary to consult the governor.

The governor does repeal it at once, and at the same time repeals the repealing act. He approves the act repealing the vicious law, and enables his friend from Indiana and his Senator—I mean the Senator from his State—to announce here that that law has been repealed, that this honest administration of Mr. Kellogg has wiped out the disgrace and restored the State once more to the people. But the fact turns out, that although the law was repealed, the governor procured the passage of an act which he may approve after the adjournment of Congress nullifying the repealing act, and restoring the old law.

Mr. President, I most willingly acquit the honorable Senator from Louisiana of any complicity in this matter. I knew at the time he made the statement that he was deceived, because his manner indicated that he thought he was stating the fact; indicated that when he read the telegram from Mr. Kellogg yesterday he was acting in good faith. Now the truth is admitted; and the Senate can see how safe it is to trust that State any longer to such parties and subject to such manipulations as this admission brings to light.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it may seem very little worth while to slay the slain, or to say anything on the subject of Mr. Kellogg, of Louisiana, after the exhibition of the past two days on this subject. His telegram of yesterday as read to the Senate and his telegram of to-day as read to the Senate picture his character truly; and it is not worth while to say anything more on the subject of such a man to the Senate of the United States or to the American people. But let it also be remembered as a fact that under the constitution of Louisiana the power of veto is, as I understand, reposed in the governor, so that when these two bills, one following rapidly upon the heels of the other, almost simultaneous in their passage, came to him, if he had intended that one should be a law and the other should not be a law, it was simply accomplished by giving his signature to the one and placing his veto upon the other.

Mr. WEST. The Senator I think would not wish to misstate the fact. Both laws went to him after the Legislature had adjourned. He cannot veto the other law until the Legislature assembles. He could approve the one which he has approved.

Mr. BAYARD. I thought the Senator from Louisiana had no knowledge of the existence of the second law. How, then, does he now speak of their both going to him subsequently to the adjournment of the Legislature? The telegrams of Mr. Kellogg have not disclosed that fact.

Mr. WEST. I resent somewhat the manner of the gentleman in intentionally setting me in the wrong; but I will state the fact. Both these laws, as it appears now, were passed within a day or two and the journals of the Legislature have not been published yet, and the press of New Orleans in the interest of the party the gentleman speaks for have not found it out. Both those laws were passed—I did not know it until I got the dispatch which I read this morning, but I know it now—within two days of the adjournment, and the laws do not go to the governor of the State under our constitution until subsequent to the adjournment.

Mr. BAYARD. All of them?

Mr. WEST. All laws passed within five days prior to the adjournment of the Legislature do not go to the governor of the State until subsequent to the adjournment, and then having those laws in his possession, he has from that time until the next session of the Legislature the opportunity either to approve or veto them. If he approves, he can approve during the recess; if he vetoes, he can only veto on the reassembling of the Legislature.

Mr. BAYARD. Well, Mr. President, the statement of facts made by the Senator on his own knowledge, either acquired to-day or yesterday, is before the Senate. A fact stated by a Senator of his own knowledge I do not impugn, because I do not propose to raise issues of veracity on this floor with any member. The facts, however, do appear in print as of yesterday and to-day, and the Senate must judge of their effect.

I was not aware of all the peculiar and very dangerous powers given to the governor of Louisiana by the constitution and laws of that State; but it seems now that these laws were passed, according to the statement of the Senator from Louisiana—he now knows them to have been passed—within two days before the adjournment, and not having been passed more than five days before the adjournment, I understand that the power of veto would not exist in the executive; that they would not be sent to him until after the adjournment, and that he may sign a bill when he pleases, or he may keep it until the next session of the Legislature and sign it at any time in the interim that he pleases. What is the effect of this statement now made to us upon what I stated to the Senate yesterday, when I said:

> If we can gather any meaning from the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana, it is an admission that these two acts have been passed, one act professing to repeal the old election law and one repealing the repealing act; so that they can be produced from the pocket of this so-called governor on the eve of the election and all this machinery which makes fraud in elections not only possible, but highly probable, will then be re-enacted should Mr. Kellogg be permitted to occupy the place he now does.

It seems now, Mr. President, that my language of yesterday is borne out precisely by the facts to-day certified, if he may certify any fact to the Senate or the country, by Mr. Kellogg himself.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this matter came up a few days ago; but I had no knowledge until yesterday that there had been a second act passed by the Louisiana Legislature. I had been advised that on the day before the last day of the session of the Legislature an act was passed repealing what was called act No. 19, which had been passed in 1873, a year ago last winter. It was news to me, therefore, that on the last day of the session, the next day, another act had been passed. It is said here that that act repealed the act of the day before. Whether that is so or not, I believe nobody is able to state this morning on the floor of the Senate. There is no dispatch here that gives any information upon that point. But there was a second law passed. I simply make the statement here for the purpose of doing justice to Governor Kellogg. It is not so clear as the Senator from Wisconsin states that Governor Kellogg has been guilty of falsehood or misrepresentation by any means. The dispatch which the Senator from Louisiana read yesterday was in these words:

> I am informed that some parties have telegraphed Senator CARPENTER and others that I have a bill before me, intending to sign and promulgate the same hereafter, which repeals the new election law. This is false.

It is not clear, and nobody has a right to say that Governor Kellogg knew that we were uninformed of the passage of the second law. The passage of a law is a thing not to be concealed, as I understand, unless it is done in executive session.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the way they do.

Mr. MORTON. My friend from Wisconsin says that is the way their laws are generally passed. I presume my friend is not correct about that. If this law was passed in open session, as I presume it was, Governor Kellogg would have no reason to suppose that the fact would be concealed. Although the journal may not have been formally published, I presume the proceedings of the Legislature were published from day to day.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is just the mistake. They were not, as I understand. They are not published yet, as I am informed.

Mr. MORTON. The proceedings may not be published officially; but that the newspapers ordinarily would report the proceedings, especially would report a fact of that kind, is clear.

Mr. SHERMAN. The newspapers do not seem to have got hold of it.

Mr. CARPENTER. It was kept secret.

Mr. MORTON. There is only one republican newspaper in New Orleans the friend of Governor Kellogg, and three papers opposed to him.

Mr. CARPENTER. Those papers were not permitted to know of this little game. Publication would have frustrated the whole design. I understand that when the governor wants a law in that State he gets two or three men from each house together and tells them so, and the law passes.

I understand that on the last day of the session, at this very session, there was a general row and knock-down, and nobody could tell for several days after what bills had passed or been rejected, and that is not determined even yet. They are still, or until very lately were, making up the journal and passing bills or rejecting them as the governor pleased. I am so informed; and this circumstance certainly corroborates that theory. Here was a law passed and another passed repealing it, a manifest trick, kept from the press in New Orleans, kept from friends and foes. The democratic press would have raised a clamor if they had known it, and that would have defeated the whole purpose, because Congress would have learned it; and the telegram that he sent here, and the fact that his own Senator on this floor was deceived about it, and that his friend from Indiana was deceived about it, show they did not intend to publish it.

Mr. MORTON. I submit that the statements of my friend from Wisconsin are entirely too uncertain upon which to fasten a charge of falsehood upon Governor Kellogg, for that is what it amounts to. The dispatch of Governor Kellogg refers to the statement that he had a law before him that he intended to sign. He says that is false, and he states to the Senator from Louisiana in the last dispatch that he did not intend to sign and never intended to approve it. It may be fair to presume, if we are to do Governor Kellogg justice, that he supposed the existence of the second law was known, and the thing he was denying was the charge that he intended after a while to sign it. That is the thing he was denying.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will not my friend——

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to go on one moment further; but I will hear the Senator.

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend's ingenuity never fails him; and on his theory of this subject I want him to give us the reason why that second law was passed. I am not talking about why it was concealed, but why was it passed; why on one day was a law passed to repeal a statute and the next day one passed to repeal the repealing statute, and both acts put in the hands of the governor at once?

Mr. MORTON. That is shifting the point a little just now. The question now is not what is the object of the second statute, but we are discussing the question as to the truthfulness of Governor Kellogg in this matter and the charge of trickery in sending these two dispatches. That is the point. The Legislature might have passed the second law without any improper design, and so far as we know they did. The Senator has no right to say to the contrary without any information, without any suggestion of it on the part of Governor Kellogg. If my friend says that Governor Kellogg procured the Legislature the next day to pass that second act, he may think so, but he has no evidence of it in the world; and I submit that he has no right to say so. The Legislature may have done that upon their own motion. It is not to be presumed that they were under the strict control of one man; and I say this now in justice to Governor Kellogg.

But now I come back to the point—the concealment of the passage of the second act. If that act was passed, unless it was done with closed doors, it was a fact that could not be concealed. If the press of New Orleans have the ordinary enterprise of newspapers, the Legislature being in session in the same town, they would have reporters there to take notes of what was going on, and the passage of such an important act as that could not be concealed. Governor Kellogg could not presume that it was concealed.

Mr. CARPENTER. The fact exists that it was concealed.

Mr. MORTON. And he would have been very foolish to have presumed that it was. How did Mr. Zacharie find it out to put it into a pamphlet some time ago and send here, and how could he write to the Senator from Kentucky if it was concealed? How did the Senator find out it was concealed? It was very poorly concealed.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the security that honest people have, that frauds of this kind cannot be effectively concealed.

Mr. MORTON. In the nature of things it could not be concealed; and it is only fair, when Governor Kellogg says that the charge that he was intending to sign that bill was false, to regard it as false.

Now I come to the point made by the Senator from Louisiana. This bill was passed, as we are informed by the Senator, on the last day of the session. It did not go into the hands of the governor until after the Legislature adjourned.

Mr. WEST. I only suppose so, because otherwise he could have transmitted it to the Legislature again during the session.

Mr. MORTON. He has five days to do that. I am going to read the constitution on that point. We are dealing now with the fact. Charges have been made upon the governor here, and all I am disposed to do is to see that no personal injustice is done to him.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORDON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that yesterday he labored under the impression that Governor Kellogg's telegram denied the existence of such a law, and not that his telegram was not intended to deny the fact that he meant to sign the bill hereafter. The Senator used this language yesterday:

I think that is a pretty square denial. The statement was made here to-day that on the last day of the session of the Legislature a bill had been passed which he had put into his pocket and had not signed, intending to hold it until after the controversy was over. I never heard of that until to-day, and I should be greatly astonished it it was true, and should regret it. I think that telegram is intended to meet that statement. He says that he holds no such bill.

Now, in connection with the impression made on the Senator's mind, I call attention to the wording of the telegram itself. What is that telegram? It says:

I am informed that some of the "last-ditchers" have telegraphed Senator CARPENTER and others that I have a bill before me, intending to sign and promulgate hereafter, which repeals the new election law.

Now the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Indiana say that the denial of this last telegram is to the fact that he intended to sign the bill; but hear what Governor Kellogg says further in this original telegram:

This is false. We can have a fair election under the present law.

Under what law, pray? Under the original law which this last law repeals? Not at all. "Under the present law," the law which he had then in his pocket.

Mr. WEST. No; no.

Mr. GORDON. What else can it mean? I submit to every candid man on the floor of the Senate that no other construction can be put on this language.

Mr. BAYARD. The last law is the present law.

Mr. GORDON. The last law is the present law, and if he intended to deny——

Mr. WEST. The Senator does not mean to say that a law is a law until the governor signs it?

Mr. GORDON. I mean to say that what he calls "the present law" was the law he held in his pocket.

Mr. WEST. He did not mean any such thing.

Mr. GORDON. He had not signed either. What does he mean by the present law? He had not signed the original law; therefore that was no present law. What could he have referred to? If neither was signed, which was the more present; the last one repealing the original law, or the original law which had been repealed? Neither had been signed, and both stood, so far as the signature of the governor was concerned, upon precisely the same footing, and one law repealed the other law. Now, I ask in all candor which the governor could have referred to? There can be no question that the Senator from Indiana construed that telegram rightly, that the governor meant squarely and flatly to deny to this Senate that he held any such law in his pocket and to deceive his friends. There is no question about it; there cannot be. The telegram then says:

This is all republicans ask, and it is what the democracy hate.

Showing conclusively that he means that "the present law," the law which he had not signed, was all that they wanted.

Mr. MORTON. When the Senator from Louisiana yesterday read the dispatch, I thought it went to the point of the existence of the law. The dispatch was read here; I did not at the time weigh the language particularly; but now I have the dispatch and I submit it to my friend upon his own candor and his own breadth of mind if it necessarily fixes the charge upon Governor Kellogg that is now imputed to him? I say I would submit it to the breadth and candor of my friend from Georgia himself upon the reading of the dispatch. The dispatch is consistent with the supposition that Governor Kellogg thought we knew of the existence of a law that had been publicly passed.

Mr. GORDON. It seems to have produced a different impression.

Mr. MORTON. The dispatch reads:

I am informed that some parties have telegraphed Senator CARPENTER and others that I have a bill before me, intending to sign and promulgate hereafter, which repeals the new election law.

For anything that the Senate knows or that I know, the denial goes to his intention to sign and to promulgate that law. The fact that the law was passed by the Legislature, unless it was done with closed doors—a circumstance that must have attracted the attention of the whole country—Governor Kellogg must have supposed to be a public one.

Now I am going to come to the point that was made by the Senator from Louisiana. I read from the constitution of Louisiana the concluding part of article 66:

If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within five days after it shall have been presented to him, it shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it; unless the General Assembly, by adjournment, prevent its return; in which case the said bill shall be returned on the first day of the meeting of the General Assembly after the expiration of said five days, or be a law.

If that act was passed on the last day of the session and came to the governor too late for his action, he has no power to veto it before the first day of the next session. That is the time when he must act upon it by returning it with his objections, and any veto that he may make before that time amounts to nothing. He may approve the law, I understand, in the mean time, according to the construction that has been given to that constitution ever since its adoption; but he cannot veto the bill except by returning it to the Legislature, with his objections, on the first day of the next session.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that in his judgment such a bill can be approved before the next meeting of the Legislature?

Mr. MORTON. I did not say that; but I say that that construction seems to have been given to the constitution of Louisiana, that the governor can approve a bill after the Legislature has adjourned and before the next session, but that he cannot veto it until he returns it to the next session. The act of 1872, the very election law that is being contended for, was approved by Governor Warmoth, the Senator will remember, in vacation.

Mr. CARPENTER. Six months after the adjournment of the Legislature.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, six months afterward. The question came up whether the approval was valid, and I understand the supreme court of Louisiana in some one of these cases—am I right about it?

Mr. CARPENTER. I think so.

Mr. MORTON. The supreme court have affirmed the approval as being valid. I give no reason for it, but I simply speak of what has been the construction of the constitution as stated to me by others.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator know of any other case in which that construction has been placed upon the law in Louisiana practically?

Mr. MORTON. Approving a bill in vacation?

Mr. HOWE. Yes; does the Senator know of any other bill which has been approved in the recess of the Legislature?

Mr. WEST. Innumerable ones have been thus approved.

Mr. MORTON. I was told last winter when this matter was before the committee that it had happened in many cases.

Mr. CARPENTER. That was conceded before the committee to be the acknowledged practice in Louisiana.

Mr. MORTON. It was conceded that so far as the approval is concerned it might be done in vacation; but of course by the terms of the constitution a bill could not be vetoed before the first day of the next session.

Mr. HOWE. I believe the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] has the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I only want to say one or two words, and that right upon this point.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Go on, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I knew of the single case to which the Senator from Indiana has alluded, where that construction was put upon the constitution, but I did not know there was any other case of the kind in the history of Louisiana. I had hoped there was no other case of the kind. I now understand from the Senator from Louisiana who sits by my side [Mr. WEST] that there had been a great many other cases where the same practice has been followed. I do not believe myself that practice is warranted by the language of the constitution.

Mr. MORTON. I should say so too. I thought so from the reading of the constitution.

Mr. HOWE. It is said now that Pennsylvania has the same clause in her constitution and in practice puts the same construction upon it. The two States are very likely to be correct in their construction. But after all I have more confidence in my own judgment than I have in any such practice, no matter how general it has been, if it be not sanctioned by judicial authority. I do not believe that is the true construction of the constitution; and if it be I cannot help but think it is a piece of intrinsic rascality in the constitution, no matter whether it is found in Louisiana, or Pennsylvania, or elsewhere.

That, however, is aside from the question, and it occurred to me that the question which has been debated with so much animation this morning was a little aside from any question which ought to be considered in the Senate. I supposed the great question under consideration here was whether Mr. Kellogg was governor of Louisiana. If the question be whether Mr. Kellogg is a rascal or not, we may require another reference and a little more testimony than we have on the point. Perhaps we shall need more testimony upon the other question before we get through with it. I think, however, if I can be indulged in a single suggestion, we had better lay aside this last question as to the personal character of Mr. Kellogg. If he be the most unmitigated whelp that ever filled office, where you find the biggest kind of whelps, you know, that does not go to settle the question whether he was elected governor of Louisiana in 1872. So I think that question had better be laid aside.

But I want to say right here, in the face of the Senate, and I should like to say it in the face of the forty millions who occupy this country, that if the Legislature of Louisiana did the thing which Senators seem to believe they did, to wit, pass one law on the subject of elections repealing an obnoxious law, which the governor approved, and then pass another law repealing the former with the intent that the governor should approve the last law prior to the next election, it was a piece of political—I want to strike out that word, or I want to supplement it with the word "moral"—a piece, then, of political and moral knavery which can find no justification with me, and I hope it will not fail to elicit the most unqualified condemnation of everybody who ever hears of it or who has any occasion to speak of it. Of course we have no evidence that such a transaction did take place in the Legislature of Louisiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it disputed by those who do profess to know?

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand that there is any dispute about it here, but it would be a little difficult to prove all that from the terms employed in the dispatch read here by the Senator from Louisiana, because we cannot to-day say what were the terms of the law which the governor approved, nor can we say definitely what were the terms of the law which that Legislature passed and which the governor has not approved. I raise no question, however, of fact about this; I only say upon the hypothesis that the Legislature did this thing, then it deserves unqualified condemnation.

I beg the Senate, inasmuch as they value their own character for justice and fair dealing, not to jump at the conclusion that Mr. Kellogg dictated this legislation, even if it took place. I ask them to refrain from doing that for two reasons: first, that it would not have the slightest effect upon the grave question under consideration; it would not affect the question whether Kellogg was governor of Louisiana at all, but it might affect the question whether we are competent and fit to pass upon any question connected with the Legislature, as it would be an act of injustice on our part. If he was implicated in this legislation it will be made known at some time in all human probability, and then it will be time enough to visit upon his head the condemnation all such conduct deserves.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Maryland, before he proceeds, permit me to correct a statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin? Owing to the very strong terms in which that Senator has characterized a provision of the constitution of Pennsylvania, which his remarks would lead us to believe are still in force, I wish to make a correction. The former constitution of Pennsylvania was held to authorize the governor to sign a bill in his hands at the adjournment of the Legislature at any time before the next session of the Legislature; but the present constitution contains the following provision:

If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the General Assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall be a law, unless he shall file the same, with his objections, in the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, and give notice thereof by public proclamation within thirty days after such adjournment.

I simply wished to correct the statement going out with that characterization by the Senator from Wisconsin as to the constitution of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WEST. There seems to be no question now on this floor but what a second election law has advanced to that stage of completion that it only requires the governor's signature to make it a statute of Louisiana; but I think the Senate, before coming to any conclusion as to whether the Legislature of that State should be condemned for the passage of that law ought to know what its features are. It might have been desirable in the interest of certain sections of that country—and I can illustrate why it should be desirable—that another law, subsequent to the one which the governor has recently approved, remedying certain evils in certain sections of that State, ought to have been passed. I have been so informed by a gentleman on this floor this morning who has recently arrived from the northern part of that State, and who tells we what was the object of this second law. It was not to remit the election machinery of Louisiana back to the old abuses that have been so much condemned, but it was to prevent frauds in certain portions of that State; and it restored the old machinery simply to this extent, that it devolved upon the governor the appointment of the officers of election instead of devolving it upon the police juries in those sections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was not that the very point of the old law?

Mr. WEST. Not altogether; and it stipulated and provided that the governor should not have the opportunity of taking a non-resident of those parishes and sending him into the parishes to supervise the election, but that he should take supervisors from the parishes themselves, and that the votes should be counted at the polls. That is what I understand to be the distinction. It has been charged here that the Legislature of Louisiana practiced a trick. I think we ought to know what that trick was; I think we ought to know what the character of that legislation was.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. We are informed that two recent acts have been passed by that Legislature in regard to elections. I understand now from the Senator's remarks that one of them has been signed and the other has not. Is that the case?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Why could not both have been signed if one could be signed? I understood from the Senator from Louisiana a few moments ago that the governor could not sign or return a bill to the Legislature that had been passed within five days of its adjournment; but if one of these acts could be signed, why not both?

In addition, Mr. President, if neither of them is signed, what is the result? The result is the old Warmoth law remains in force, so that in either case it appears to me that it is just as the governor of Louisiana wishes it.

Mr. MORTON. I will state to my friend that the dispatch read here shows that the first act was approved and promulgated on the 28th of March, and the very point referred to is that by the constitution the governor cannot veto a bill until the first day of the next session where it comes to him after the expiration of the Legislature, but that according to practice down there he may approve a bill in the vacation. Whether that practice is correct or not I am not saying; but that has been the practice, and it seems to have been affirmed by the supreme court in regard to the act of 1872.

Mr. DAVIS. That may be true; but it does not change the facts in the case.

Mr. WEST. Well, I will answer the question. The Senator asks me why one act should be signed and another should not be. For the reason simply that the governor desired to sign one act and did not desire to sign the other. Since I have stood here comes this dispatch:

The journal shows that two bills relating to elections and one registration bill passed last five days of the session. Registration law unobjectionable.

That is, during the five days prior to the adjournment of that Legislature two election laws were passed by the Legislature. Those two election laws are submitted to the governor. He takes them. He says "under the constitution, under the usage, I can sign one, and I do so because I approve of it. I cannot sign, I cannot veto the other until the next Legislature meets."

Mr. DAVIS. Did the governor say that?

Mr. WEST. The law says it.

Mr. DAVIS. But I understood the Senator to be repeating what the governor had said.

Mr. WEST. No, sir; the Senator asked me why both laws could not be signed. I tell him the reason is because the governor approves one and declines to approve the other. Is not that an answer to his proposition?

Mr. DAVIS. It may be satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. WEST. I cannot satisfy the Senator any further.

Mr. DAVIS. When did the Legislature adjourn?

Mr. WEST. The Legislature adjourned on the 5th of March.

Mr. DAVIS. When were the acts passed?

Mr. WEST. The dispatch says:

Two bills relating to election passed within last five days of session.

But they do not go to the governor, under the practice there, until after the Legislature adjourns, and then he has during all the time from that adjournment until the reassembling of the body or the successor of the body the opportunity to either approve or veto, but the approval can be promulgated and the veto cannot.

Mr. DAVIS. Now I should like to ask the Senator how he knows that one of these bills was approved and the other not?

Mr. WEST. Simply because I have the official journal here showing that it is approved.

Mr. DAVIS. Yesterday and this morning inquiry was to know the fact and nobody knew it. My friend yesterday did not know that such acts had passed. His first knowledge was yesterday evening, I understand.

Mr. WEST. I yielded to the Senator to ask me a question. I will answer any question he may ask; but I submit that he must not——

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask my friend, then, whether he had the official record yesterday?

Mr. WEST. Of what?

Mr. DAVIS. Of the two acts having been passed.

Mr. WEST. No, sir; I have stated that. I had the official record yesterday that one act was passed and signed, and I knew nothing whatever of the other act. That is what I stated.

Mr. DAVIS. When did the official record come?

Mr. WEST. By this morning's mail; here it is on my desk, dated last Sunday.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I understand that the governor now holds an act ready to be signed whenever it may suit his convenience, at any time between now and the next Legislature, which renews what is known as the Warmoth law.

Mr. WEST. No, sir; there is where I differ with the Senator. As I am informed it does not do so; it qualifies between the two; it enables the governor to appoint supervisors in the parishes but not to send aliens there, if I can so express it; and that was the great objection, that convenient tools were picked out from political cess-pools and sent up there to distort the expression of the will of the people. That is not even admitted in the new law.

Mr. DAVIS. That information came this morning, did it not? The information just given about the changes of the law, as I understand the Senator, came this morning to him.

Mr. WEST. No, sir; I say the official notification, the first intimation that any of us had here that that law passed was in the letter that I read a short time ago from the governor himself, dated the 10th of April.

Mr. DAVIS. But the provisions of the last law now held by the governor are what I refer to.

Mr. WEST. I never knew anything about that law until I got that dispatch last night.

Mr. DAVIS. That dispatch, as I understand, did not state anything about the provisions of that law?

Mr. WEST. No.

Mr. DAVIS. Yet the Senator gives us the provisions of the law.

Mr. WEST. Because I got them here from a member of Congress from the State of Louisiana on this floor this morning—a man that I hunted for last night and could not find. What is the intention in trying to put me in a false position here continuously?

Mr. DAVIS. We want information. Yesterday we asked information as regards——

Mr. WEST. You do not propose to get information by putting words into my mouth.

Mr. DAVIS. If I put words there, I cannot put the kind that will come out. [Laughter.] I am certain to get some other.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, I have listened very patiently to the discussion of the character of Governor Kellogg. I think that man has had about as much now as he is able to bear for the present. I know that gentleman from reputation and from history and from our examinations in this body and elsewhere; and to excoriate him here again before this body, I think, is rather cruel; but I may be pardoned for one moment in dwelling on what has been discussed here this morning, so that we may not be taken to be ignorant about what was going on yetserday.

I was about in as bad condition as the Senator from Indiana yesterday. When I heard that dispatch read, I certainly understood that it referred to the bill Mr. Kellogg had then in his possession. The Senator from Indiana so understood it, and I so understood, and we all so understood. What is most remarkable about his dispatch is this: he pronounces that statement false. False in what respect? False as to the law or false as to the fact that he intended to sign it? The whole question depends upon that in regard to this point. His dispatch was evasive and equivocal, as I thought then. When we see the one presented this morning, we see that both are evasive and equivocal. Who can understand that dispatch which he sent here last night and we have heard this morning? If the honorable Senator from Louisiana continues much longer the controversy on this preliminary question, we shall have the whole laws of Louisiana here before us. That honorable Senator from Louisiana has now probably gone to see some Representative from that State, and we may have, before we get through this discussion, at all events by intendment or by imagination, the whole laws of that State, because it is now seriously disputed whether any law of the kind has passed at all, and the honorable Senator in his concluding remarks has undertaken to give us an entirely different impression about what has been passed by that Legislature, and I am sure the dispatch of Governor Kellogg throws no light on the subject at all. He refers to section 19 and says it repeals a certain law passed in 1872, and another one passed in 1873, and in this cursory discussion we have not time to examine those laws and determine what their provisions are. However, one thing was distinctly stated yesterday, and Governor Kellogg knows it as well as any gentleman on this floor, that there was a repealing act of the act that was passed at the late session. Governor Kellogg knows that just as well as he knows the fact that Durell had no jurisdiction over this matter when he went before him for the purpose of filing his bill and getting possession of the State government. It is all a farce from beginning to end, and it shows up the character of this whole case. This little personal explanation made by the Senator from Louisiana this morning exhibits the whole character of this case, and it shows that it is one of the most extraordinary cases ever presented for our consideration.

But I do not care to consider Mr. Kellogg in his individuality. As was very properly said by the Senator from Louisiana, and the Senator from Indiana, and the Senator from Wisconsin, we have nothing to do with the individuality of Mr. Kellogg. I have nothing to do with his name. I do not know or care whether he is Mr. Kellogg or anybody else. The question is the official position that he holds in the State of Louisiana that he should give us all of this great trouble. We were engaged during the last session of Congress, we are to-day engaged, in discussing the character of Mr. Kellogg—not Kellogg in his individuality, but in the official position that he may occupy, and occupying that has given so much trouble to the people of this country, and especially of the State of Louisiana. But now I will proceed, Mr. President, with the line of remarks I was making yesterday in the regular discussion of the question I had in contemplation.

[Mr. HAMILTON resumed and concluded the argument commenced by him yesterday. His remarks will appear in full in the Appendix.]

[Mr. MORTON addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. TIPTON obtained the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? I wish to propound a question to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. TIPTON. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. MERRIMON. In no spirit of captiousness, I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana a question, with a view to see exactly the whole scope of the ground that he occupies. Suppose that the State of New York should for any cause be without a governor, without a Legislature, and without any State officers whatsoever, do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that Congress in that case could not take such action as would enable the people of New York to elect officers to fill such vacant offices?

Mr. MORTON. That makes the case pretty nearly the condition of the Southern States at the end of the war. They were without governments of any kind. It was necessary therefore, in the very nature of our Government, that they should be reconstructed, and upon republican principles. That presented a case where the Government of the United States had a right to interfere and reconstruct those States.

Now my friend from North Carolina puts the case of the State of New York, where the governor is gone, the State officers are all gone, and the Legislature is gone. Now if there is any government left there I hardly know what it is. It presents a case where there is no government; and it would be hard to guarantee a republican form of government in the total absence of government. But suppose there is a governor wanting; the governor is dead, and the laws of New York provide no way for supplying his place. I think that would hardly destroy the State government of New York. While there is enough left to form a State government, or where the laws of a State provide for supplying the vacancies of the officers that are dead or have fled the State, there is no occasion for the interposition of Congress. But that is not this case. Here is a case of a State government in full and complete operation in every department going on successfully and well, a State government sanctioned by the courts and by all those tribunals which the constitution and laws of the State have prescribed. The question is whether because of an alleged fraud (which for the sake of the argument I am admitting) it is competent for Congress to come in and set aside that government, and order a new election under Federal authority and force officers thus elected upon the State of Louisiana in contravention of her constitution and laws? I say no. If that power exists, then there are no State governments except as tenants at will under the authority and by the consent of the Government of the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend will allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand his point to be that if a State be found without any government whatever Congress may interfere, but if the State have a government which is held by usurpation throughout, then Congress is powerless in the premises. Is that the position?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator can state it.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the way I understand it, and silence gives consent.

Mr. MORTON. What I have said was that the State of Louisiana is amenable to the people of Louisiana, and that government must be the accepted government of the State that is recognized by those tribunals in the State which are specially created and authorized to determine such questions; that if, as the Senator says, we had a right to interfere in New York because it was alleged that the governor was elected by fraud, we have a right to interfere where the Legislature is elected by fraud. In other words, that the Congress of the United States is the general canvassing board for all State officers and State Legislatures, and can turn them out at its sovereign will and pleasure. I say there is a broad distinction between such a case as that and the case contemplated by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator from Nebraska will yield to me a few minutes——

Mr. TIPTON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is now past four o'clock, late in the day, and I apprehend the Senator would hardly be able to conclude this evening; and if it be agreeable to the Senator I will move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TIPTON. I give way.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

BISMARCK LAND DISTRICT.

Mr. RAMSEY. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota be taken from the table and considered now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

It creates all that portion of Dakota Territory lying north of the seventh standard parallel and west of the ninth guide meridian into a separate land district, to be known as the Bismarck district; the land office to be located at the town of Bismarck, where the North Pacific Railroad intersects the Missouri River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has that been reported from a committee?

Mr. RAMSEY. A bill in the same words has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands here.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 16, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business; and I desire to inquire of the committee next on call in the morning hour whether they have any objection to allowing the legislative appropriation bill to be taken up now? If there is any committee that desires particularly to go on in the morning hour to-day, I will not antagonize it; but I have thought probably it might be arranged to let the House proceed with this bill immediately.

Mr. MOREY. The Committee on the Mississippi Levees will very soon be called in the morning hour—probably this morning. We have an important subject before us, and we wish to ask that a future day be fixed for its consideration. We shall probably not occupy more than ten minutes of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is aware that this is a question which the majority of the House can settle.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am aware of that. My proposition will not interfere at all with fixing a day for the measure which may be reported from the Committee on the Mississippi Levees. To test the sense of the House, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the special order.

Mr. SPEER. There is hardly a quorum in the Hall, I think.

Mr. MOREY. The Committee on the Mississippi Levees——

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield to allow the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] to make his request.

Mr. CLYMER. A number of gentlemen who I know are interested in matters embraced in the legislative appropriation bill are now out of their places, and they would be taken unawares by the action of the House in going into Committee of the Whole at this time. I think it would hardly be fair to them.

Mr. MOREY. If there be no objection, I ask permission to report at this time from the Committee on the Mississippi Levees a substitute for a House resolution which was referred to us.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can ask to have it printed and recommitted; and then when his committee is regularly called, the matter will be in an advanced state.

Mr. MOREY. I ask the House to let us have one day after the morning hour, to the exclusion of everything else except appropriation bills, for the consideration of this subject.

The SPEAKER. The House must either do one thing or the other; it must either decide to go into the Committee of the Whole or to proceed with the regular order.

REPORT ON MOIETIES, TREASURY CONTRACTS, ETC.

Mr. DAWES. Before the question is put on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Ways and Means a resolution to which I presume there will be no objection, and which we desire to have adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be, and is hereby, authorized to report in print at any time to the House on the matter of moieties, and on the contracts under the act of March 8, 1872, known as the "Sanborn contracts."

There being no objection, the resolution was considered as agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLEY. Has the morning hour been dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. It has not been. It will be dispensed with if the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] should prevail.

Mr. KELLEY. As I have a report to make from a committee that is very near being called, I would ask leave before the morning hour is dispensed with to report a bill and have it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour can only be dispensed with by a majority vote; and as the House now stands there will be no necessity of submitting the motion if there be no objection, as there is evidently not a quorum present.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not wish to antagonize the appropriation bill, but I hope the morning hour will not be dispensed with.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. GARFIELD, there were—ayes 68, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. KELLEY. No further count will be insisted on, I think.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. CLYMER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 86, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the Proposed National Census of 1875 a bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in dia of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand what points of order can be reserved.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Nor do I understand; but I wish to reserve any points of order that can possibly be taken. This is an appropriation bill, I understand.

The SPEAKER. On the regular appropriation bills the reservation of points of order has some relevancy, because frequently independent legislation is put upon those bills. But the only point of this bill is that it appropriates $3,000,000, to which, as the Chair understands, the gentleman designs to object.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I enter the reservation, whatever it may be worth.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the point has any pertinency or relevancy.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If it has no pertinency, it does no harm.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, $28,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move in line 184 to strike out "28" and insert "10;" so it will read:

For miscellaneous items, $10,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I am having prepared a careful statement giving in detail the items making up this appropriation, and I ask him to withhold his amendment until that statement is prepared. I also ask for the present that this paragraph be passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEREFORD. I do not desire to object; but I also have an amendment to offer to this paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's amendment will be in order when it comes up again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and this paragraph for the present is passed over. When it is again called up the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] to offer their amendments.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not know that yesterday we passed the paragraph for cartage, $2,000, in line 183, so that the point of order would lie against my now calling attention to it, but there was no action taken on that paragraph in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee ceased action with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] to line 182, and the Chair will therefore recognize the gentleman from Illinois to move an amendment to line 183.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this paragraph of cartage, $2,000, and ask him to request that also be passed over by unanimous consent, and that he may have prepared a specific statement of the items going to make up this appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say in regard to cartage that not only last year but this year also the Committee on Appropriations carefully examined this whole subject. In this paragraph of cartage is included a class of expenditures such as carrying off ashes and doing similar work required to be done about the Capitol. It was formerly done at so much per load. The committee went carefully over it to prevent any constructive charges, and finding there was a chance of constructive cartage reduced the appropriation to the lowest amount possible. We have reported the same amount as last year, and the committee believe it is the lowest amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois offer the amendment?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I withdraw my objection on the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. Line 184 is passed over for the present and permission is given to return to it again at another time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For newspapers and stationery, including $6,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $43,750.

Mr. BECK. I rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking why so large an item as $43,750 is provided here for newspapers and stationery, including $6,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House for the next fiscal year?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is aware, according to the law of last year, $125 is allowed for newspapers and stationery to each of the three hundred and odd Members and Delegates of the House, and that is what makes the increase in the total amount. There is here, however, a reduction. Last year the appropriation for stationery for committees was $10,000; we have reduced it now to $6,000. The increase of the other item is because of the increase in the number of members.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to strike out the paragraph, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For stationery for the use of committees and officers of the House, $6,000.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, briefly to explain that amendment. The paragraph of the bill reported from the committee appropriates the sum of $43,750 for the purpose of furnishing newspapers and stationery to the committees and officers of the House of Representatives, $6,000 being for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, and the balance being for the purpose of paying $125 to each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives for the purpose of furnishing him with newspapers and stationery. I want it distinctly understood that I have never seen anything especially improper in this, but as we have commenced in the line of economy here—as we have already abolished all mileage; as we have "wiped out" all perquisites upon the ground they could not be justified, after the House by the passage of the salary bill agreed that should be a finality on this question, and then came in here yesterday and violated that agreement—I say after these things I think we should follow out the line of economy to its legitimate conclusions and wipe out each and every one of these perquisites. Here we have $125 allowed to each member for newspapers and stationery. I do not know whether we all use it or not, but I hold if we desire to practice economy we should be consistent in so doing and take the same action in regard to all these perquisites.

The House declared to the country that the man who comes from the Pacific coast, with his family, ought not to be paid anything for traveling from that country; that he ought to receive the same as a member living in sight of this Capitol, who can go home two or three times a week and draw his pay all the time and attend to his business in the courts, visit his family, and do anything else he may desire. Let us equalize the thing. Let every member be placed on the same equality, and let the equality be fixed at $5,000 a year. By so doing we can save this amount of $38,000. The people seem to demand that we shall save every farthing at this time. Let us do it. Let us pay this out of our own pockets.

I did not believe the people made this demand when I came to Congress; but judging from our votes, and from the fact that our votes reflect the will of our constituents, I have come to the conclusion that they do now demand it. And if we cannot maintain before the country the proposition of mileage, we cannot maintain the proposition that gives the members pocket-knives and gold toothpicks and everything of that character. I insist on my amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that the gentleman claims that certain amendments have been made in the spirit of demagogism, and that now he does not propose to be outdemagogued. Is that it?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I would prefer the privilege, as long as I am a member of this House, of expressing my own sentiments, rather than have the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] or anybody else expressing them for me. I have not said any such thing as he has indicated. I think, and I assert, in the face of the agreement made by the committee on the salary question, and adopted by this House, that the spirit which prompted us yesterday to violate that agreement was not exactly consistent. I voted for that proposition because from this on I am, as I have ever been, in the line of economy with the most extreme in the House. I have expressed no such sentiment as the gentleman attributes to me.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman say exactly what the agreement was to which he has referred?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The agreement impliedly was, that when the special committee on the salary bill made a report to this House, and when the House adopted that report, that should be a finality on this question for this Congress.

Mr. DAWES. I did not for one, as the gentleman knows, exactly agree with the committee.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The agreement was sanctioned by a majority of the members of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, there were—ayes 62, noes 109.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, called for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers——

Mr. SENER. I make the point of order that a quorum has voted, and that it is for the committee, and not the Chair, to order tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] is well taken.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, there were—ayes 39; more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, and Mr. GARFIELD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 92; no quorum voting.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I do not insist on a further count; but I desire to give notice that I will offer this as an amendment to the bill when it is reported back to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] gives notice that he will offer as an amendment to the bill, when it is reported back to the House, what has just been voted on.

Mr. McKEE. Do I understand that this can be offered as an amendment when the bill is reported back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has given notice that he will offer this as an amendment to the bill when it is reported back to the House for final action.

Mr. McKEE. Will the gentleman have an opportunity of having the yeas and nays on the question, when the bill is reported to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. That will depend upon whether the House orders the previous question on the bill as a whole.

Mr. McKEE. How can the gentleman obtain the yeas and nays on his amendment unless we now put the amendment into the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. HALE, of New York. I demand the regular order.

Mr. McKEE. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in payment of stationery for Senators, Members, or Delegates.

My reason for offering this amendment is simply this: I wish this amendment to be adopted in order that we may have the yeas and nays on this question in the House. Our eastern friends, and those living near the capital, are very anxious to retrench and economize, provided it does not come out of their pockets. I want to see how they will vote when it comes to the question of taking this trifling sum out of their pockets.

This amendment will take some money out of the pocket of every member here. It does not take it from the pockets of the members from afar off only. You have seen by the vote just taken how much genuine economy there is in this House. Members are very willing to economize out of the pockets of somebody else, and that is how the bill abolishing mileage was passed here when reported from a committee without debate and rushed through under the previous question. All I seek is to show how much genuine economy there is in this House, and therefore I ask that my amendment be voted on and put in the bill, and then we can have the yeas and nays on it in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and call for a vote.

Mr. BIERY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. It seems to me that there is a disposition sometimes to run to extremes. It seems to me that the proposition which the House passed yesterday with reference to mileage has seized hold upon a great many minds here, and there is now a disposition to cavil at small matters. I believe, sir, that it is for the good of the legislation of this country that we should maintain some balance of mind in our action here.

This amendment, as I understand it, is to strike out a little trifling item, and might perhaps take a fraction of a penny out of my pocket and a fraction of a penny out of the pocket of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. McKEE. It will take $125.

Mr. BIERY. Very well; supposing that is so. It proposes then that the members here shall buy the stationery upon which they are to write every matter that relates to the public business with their own money. This matter of stationery is not one that pertains to men's individual business. It is not right or just that members should be called upon to expend their money for the stationery upon which we write what amendments we have to offer, what bills we may have to draw up, and matters of that kind.

Mr. McKEE. Do you use $125 worth of stationery for that purpose?

Mr. BIERY. I do not know. The gentleman from Mississippi may be able to inform the House on that point better than I can; but I say that whatever amount of stationery is required here for the purpose of doing the public business ought to be furnished by the Government. I therefore oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken upon Mr. McKEE's amendment; and it was not agreed to—ayes 35, noes not counted.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It is suggested that I did not give the proper notice a while ago in reference to the amendment which I propose to offer in the House. I give notice that I shall call the yeas and nays on that amendment when it comes into the House.

Mr. RICE. The gentleman gave that notice once before.

Mr. SHELDON. I was absent from the House yesterday when the provision of this bill was passed over that I intended to call the attention of the committee to, and I now ask unanimous consent to go back to it that I may move to strike out lines 103, 104, and 105, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $1,535,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Out of particular regard for my friend from Louisiana, I object to going back. I think he will be obliged to me for objecting.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public printing:

For compensation of the Congressional Printer, and the clerks and messenger in his office, $13,917.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move to insert after the clause just read the following:

Provided, That so much of the act entitled "An act providing for the election of a Congressional Printer," approved 22d February, 1867, as provides for the election of such officer by the Senate and provides that such officer shall be deemed an officer of the Senate, be, and the same hereby is, repealed; that the title of said officer shall hereafter be "the Public Printer," and he shall be deemed an officer of the United States; and whenever a vacancy in said office shall hereafter occur, the same shall be filled by appointment by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask if that amendment has been made in order to this bill?

Mr. HALE, of New York. The House, by a suspension of the rules some four weeks ago, permitted it to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is in order.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I beg the attention of the committee for only two or three minutes while I state the object and effect of this amendment. Prior to the year 1867 the officer in charge of the public printing was denominated "Superintendent of Public Printing." He was an officer of the United States, appointed in constitutional form by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In the year 1867 Congress, moved undoubtedly by proper motives, doubtless having some reference to the relations then existing between the then President of the United States and the majority of the two Houses of Congress, passed an act which made this officer no longer an officer of the United States, declared him to be an officer of the Senate, and authorized his election by the Senate as such officer, changing the name of the officer from "Superintendent of Public Printing" to "Congressional Printer," though evidently "Senatorial Printer" would have been more in consonance with the provisions of the bill. That law has remained in force ever since. I think all the House can see that there is every probability that it will always remain a law unless it shall be repealed by a provision embodied in an appropriation bill. Legislative bodies are not accustomed to surrender any power once conferred upon them, unless it be an enforced surrender. Of course I make this as a general remark, not to have any application to any particular legislative body.

It seems to me that, in view of the duties of this officer, it would be just as proper to declare the General-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, or the head of the Customs Department, or the collector of the port of New York, or elsewhere, an officer of the Senate, as it is to declare this printer an officer of the Senate. In no sense is he or can he be an officer of the Senate, except as the statute says he shall be. And by the same rule any other public officer might be made an officer of the Senate or an officer of this House. In idea, in scheme, this is an absurdity, and one that certainly this House ought not to tolerate the existence of for one day longer than it can prevent. The Public Printer is not a printer merely for the two Houses of Congress even. He is a printer for the Government, for every department of the Government, not only for the legislative, but the executive and judicial departments. He is an officer of the United States, and should be appointed in constitutional form as such officer.

I hope, therefore, that this committee, and the House following the committee, will adopt this amendment, and will adhere to it under all circumstances, and make it a part of this bill without any change in substance.

Mr. BASS. I do not understand why this amendment should be offered at this time. The gentleman who advocates it seems to concede that it is not strictly in order as an amendment to this bill, and if it is to be adopted in this way upon an appropriation bill, it is because there is no probability that it will become enacted in the proper and legitimate way of enactment.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Allow me to correct the gentleman. Instead of admitting that the amendment was not strictly in order, I have endeavored to satisfy the committee that it is in order, and so made by a two-thirds vote of the House, and that this is the only way in which the remedy can be had.

Mr. BASS. I understood the gentleman sought to satisfy the committee that this ought to be in order, and I understood from him also at the same time that there was no probability of this amendment ever becoming a law unless it was tacked on an appropriation bill, and allowed to be carried through in that way, and not left to stand upon its own merits.

Every gentleman in this House knows that divers resolutions have been presented and passed requiring an investigation into the affairs of the office of Congressional Printer. Desiring to treat the Congressional Printer with that fairness to which any one is entitled who holds a place under the Government of the United States, it seems to me that the House of Representatives, by coming to the conclusion at once that the tenure of his office should be changed, will thereby impute some wrong or error in the administration of that office which I believe nothing already made known can justify.

Mr. HALE, of New York. There is not a syllable in my amendment that imputes anything wrong to the Congressional Printer.

Mr. BASS. I desire to ask the gentleman if the insinuation that goes with the proposed change is not that there is something in the affairs of that office that requires the tenure of the office to be changed in order that it may be corrected? The affairs of that office are now being investigated by the Committee on Printing of this House, I understand, but they have not yet made their report. I take it for granted that we are not willing to make intimations of this kind against the Congressional Printer, such as may be drawn from this amendment, until there shall be some report to justify it.

The gentleman says further, as I infer from his statement, that from the fact that the Congressional Printer holds his place by a vote of the Senate he is therefore to be deemed a senatorial officer, an officer of the Senate, and not of the Government. I would like to inquire what there is in the fact that a particular officer is selected for his place by the Senate that makes him an officer of the Senate more than an officer of the Government of the United States? By a statute on our statute-books the Congressional Printer has certain duties to perform, and he must discharge those duties according to laws enacted by Congress and approved by the President of the United States. The fact that he holds his place by a vote of the Senate makes him no less an officer of the Government of the United States than if he was nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Why is it necessary to take the appointing power away from the Senate and give it to the President? If the power was so transferred and the nomination made by the President and confirmed by the Senate, what is it that the gentleman desires to correct by that means? The power is now lodged in the Senate to select this officer, as power is lodged in the Senate to select divers other officers in the administration of the affairs of the Government, as this House now has the power to select certain officers who discharge public duties. I do not see the necessity of this change; and unless some grievance exists, unless it is believed that the officer now selected cannot or does not properly discharge the duties of the office, and that there will be a correction of the evil if the selection is transferred to some other tribunal, it seems to me that this change should not be made.

Mr. DONNAN. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying to the committee that this proposed amendment comes with full authority from the Committee on Printing. I think it is misunderstood by my excellent friend from New York, [Mr. BASS.] It is not designed in any manner or form as an attack on the present Public Printer, nor does it propose to change the tenure of his office; it does not propose to legislate him out of office. It simply provides that when a vacancy shall hereafter occur in this office, the officer shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, as was always the case in the past since we have had a Public Printer, until 1867. Congress would have the same justification, by all parity of reasoning, in saying that the Senate should appoint all the postmasters of the country as to say that it has the authority and the right to select the Public Printer for this Government. In my judgment the appointing power should be returned, as I believe this House will vote to return it, to where it has been heretofore until a comparatively recent period.

The amendment ought not to be construed as casting any insinuation upon the Public Printer. It is not so intended; and I want the House to so understand. Let the question as to the administration of the present incumbent stand upon its own merits, under investigation, where it ought to stand. The question now presented is simply whether this officer, like all other officers of the same character, shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. That is the whole substance of the amendment; and I believe the House is prepared to act on it. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I renew the amendment to strike out the last word. The very extraordinary speech of my colleague from the Buffalo district [Mr. BASS] requires a word of response. It has demonstrated a most singular misapprehension on his part not only of the amendment which I have offered, but of the Constitution of the United States, with which he ought to be somewhat familiar.

As it has been stated by my colleague on the Printing Committee, [Mr. DONNAN,] this amendment carefully guards against any interference with the present incumbent of the office of Congressional Printer. It so happens that the incumbent is a constituent of my colleague, whose zeal outruns his discretion when he fancies that this amendment is an attack on the present Public Printer. It is purely an attempt to vindicate the principles of sound government.

But my colleague makes the statement—a remarkable one for a lawyer to make—that there is no objection to an officer of the United States being elected by the Senate or by this House; that the thing is often done. I beg to refer my colleague, for his information, to the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the President shall appoint all "officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. The act of 1867, by which the Congressional Printer was made elective by the Senate, was passed under an emergency, as I understand the gentleman to state.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I really wish my friend from Indiana would not interrupt me.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to inquire whether that emergency has now passed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I prefer to make my own speech. I know the gentleman from Indiana can make it better than I can; but I wish to make it myself. All there is in this matter is that the act of 1867 undertook to circumvent the Constitution of the United States by declaring a man who was a public officer to all intents and purposes to be nominally an officer of the Senate. I think we have submitted to that quite as long as is consistent with the dignity and decency of this House.

A single point more. Within the last year we have imposed upon this printer the duty of publishing the debates. Now I ask every member of this House whether there is any consistency or propriety or decency in having the publication of the debates in this House under the control and charge of an officer of the Senate?

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to oppose the amendment pro forma. I happened to be in Congress in 1867, when this law in regard to the Congressional Printer, which the gentleman from New York now desires to modify by this amendment, was passed, and I understood it was passed because Congress thought then that the patronage of the President of the United States was too large; that it was not only dangerous to extend that patronage, but desirable to circumscribe it as much as possible, to take it away wherever that could be done safely; and this was regarded as a case in which the President might properly be deprived of the patronage he had before exercised. So we passed a law providing that the Senate of the United States should elect this Public Printer. Now I want to know from the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] whether the emergency which was supposed to require the enactment of that law has passed, or whether on further consideration it has been deemed better to trust the President with the appointment of this officer—to reconfer upon the President the patronage involved in the appointment of the officer who discharges the duties of Public Printer under the order of Congress. I would like to know why it is that, though it was considered bad policy in 1867 to allow the President to appoint this officer, it is deemed good policy in 1874 to confer again upon the President the power to nominate and appoint the Public Printer to do the congressional printing.

Mr. HALE, of New York. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has appealed to me, I am very happy to reply to his question. I cannot answer for the motives which induced the Thirty-ninth Congress to pass the enactment referred to; but if I am at liberty to imagine the reason, I am free to say that I think the emergency which called for the passage of that enactment has passed, the relations between the President and Congress having been changed.

In that connection I will add, having been, as well as my friend from Indiana, a member of the Congress which passed this act, I fully concurred with him at the time in opposition to it, deeming it an unwise and improper measure. I have never changed my mind on that subject.

Mr. NIBLACK. I thought the gentleman did change his mind, but I remember now that he was suspected somewhat of being a Johnson republican—only in a mild form, however.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his amendment to the amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will do so.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I renew the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will prevail; I think it ought to. If it were a proposition to place the Capitol, including the folding-room of this House and the public grounds connected with this Capitol, under a superintendent to be appointed or elected by the Senate, it seems to me no gentleman on this floor could assent to such a proposition for a moment. Yet this existing law which authorizes a Public Printer, an officer of the Government connected as much with this branch of Congress as the other, to be elected or chosen by the Senate and placed in the position he holds by the Senate is an utterly indefensible proposition, as much so as in the case I put as an illustration.

Now, sir, I know as a matter of fact, and I presume other gentlemen on this floor know it, that when we have been to the present occupant of this position to solicit a place for a constituent we have been met by the statement that that office is an office conferred by the Senate; that he is an officer of the Senate and under peculiar relations to the Senate. It seems to me it is time we should come back to the true principle of electing this officer, or that the power of making an appointment, if the present system is to be continued, shall be lodged where by the Constitution it is lodged. We should insist on this amendment with the view of coming back to that position which the Constitution indicates.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman withdraws the amendment to the amendment, and I renew it.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] both members of the Joint Committee on Printing, have been careful to say they do not wish to bring any question relating to the conduct of the Public Printer into the discussion of this case. I sympathize with them in that regard, and do not propose now myself to refer to any charges which have been made, except to say that it is well known by the country that serious and grave charges have been made against the management of the Public Printing Office by a very respectable and influential journal in this city, and that in view of these charges I presented to the House a resolution and had it referred to that committee. I understand, in pursuance of the duties under that resolution, this committee could not get the Public Printer before them, simply because he claimed that he was an officer of the Senate, and a committee of this House could not call him to account. Although serious charges were made against the management of that office, yet no committee of this House could call that printer before them and examine him as to the management of that office, because he was an officer of the Senate, appointed by the Senate, and responsible alone to the Senate.

I say I only refer to this fact to show the importance of this amendment, in order that the Public Printer may be made an officer of this House as well as of the Senate, so that when serious charges are made against an officer of this Government this House, which has an interest in the management of that office, may call him before it and question him and investigate his conduct.

Mr. BASS. I understand my colleague to say that by introducing the amendment he has on this occasion he does not design to make any imputation against the Congressional Printer or anticipate that the effect of his amendment will be to make a vacancy in the office. I so understand him. If that be so, then in order to settle the question I desire to move this amendment:

Provided further, That the repeal of the said act of February 22, 1867, shall not operate to remove the present Congressional Printer.

Mr. NIBLACK. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. BASS. Permit me to make one suggestion.

Mr. NIBLACK. The point of order that I make is this, that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] was only received because it was made in order by a vote of the House under a suspension of the rules, and this not having been provided for by a suspension of the rules is not therefore in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that, as the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] is germane to the amendment which the House by a suspension of the rules allowed to be offered in Committee of the Whole, it is one which the Chair will entertain.

Mr. TREMAIN. If my colleague will allow me I desire to ask him a question for information. What does the gentleman understand to be the tenure of the office of the Congressional Printer under existing law?

Mr. BASS. He holds his office at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman then propose by his amendment that we shall legislate for the Senate?

Mr. BASS. I am surprised at the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He could not have heard the amendment read. The amendment simply proposes that the adoption of the amendment moved by my colleague [Mr. HALE] shall not of itself operate to remove the present Congressional Printer. He will be subject to the same causes of removal that would be applicable under existing law.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman then mean to provide that the amendment of his colleague shall have no effect whatever?

Mr. BASS. I mean that this amendment of itself shall not operate to remove the Congressional Printer.

Mr. DAWES. I would suggest to the gentleman that he modify his amendment so that it shall be plain to us all by making it read "provided this shall have no effect whatever unless the Senate are willing."

Mr. BASS. Instead of the gentleman asking me whether I desire to legislate for the Senate, I think I may ask him whether he designs to legislate for the Senate.

It is known to all of us that the Congressional Printer has more intimate official relations with members of Congress than with any other branch of the Government. In the publication of the proceedings of this House and of the Senate his relations with Congress are of the most intimate character. Now permit me to suggest that the officer who publishes the debates of this House and of the Senate ought to be a congressional officer and not an officer elected by the Senate. But, at any rate, an officer of Congress, whose duty it is to publish the debates of Congress, should be elected by Congress, either by the one branch or the other or by both branches together. I would be in favor of a proposition, if it can be put into proper shape, that the Congressional Printer should be elected by the joint action of the two Houses of Congress. It is with Congress that his relations are most intimate. We are required to appeal to him for justice on various occasions in connection with the publication of the debates. His proofs come to your rooms for revision. It seems to me, therefore, that it is better that he should be selected by the Senate of the United States than that he should be selected by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. If he could be selected by the House I would be very glad that that should be done, but probably the Senate would not permit that as the law now stands. And if he could be elected by the joint action of the two Houses, that, it seems to me, would be still better and would meet the general view of the members of Congress. But as between his being appointed by the Senate of the United States or being appointed by the President, I think gentlemen on this floor should see to it that the tenure of the office should remain as it is rather than that the appointment should be transferred to the President of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There is a point in regard to this matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House in a single word.

It seems to me that we are bound, in order to support the Constitution, to repeal the existing law. The Congressional Printer is not made an officer of the Senate merely by calling him so. If that were the case, every officer throughout the United States might be made an officer of the Senate. Whether he is an officer of the Senate in fact depends on his duty.

Now the Congressional Printer not only does the printing of the Senate and of the House, but he also does the printing of all the Departments; he does the printing of all the public documents. He is therefore a public officer, and not an officer of one branch of the Government. Now the constitution expressly limits the power of appointing public officers to the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, except that—

Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Congress, therefore, is prohibited by limitation of the Constitution from creating any public officer who shall be elected either by the Senate or by the House, or by both jointly. It is true that the power is given to the Senate to elect its own officers, and the power is given to the House to elect its own officers; but whether the person so elected is an officer of either branch of the government is a question not of language but of law. It will not be contended that this officer is in fact and in substance an officer of the Senate alone. The Senate, therefore, under the peculiar condition of things which grew up under the administration of President Johnson, has had vested in it the power of electing a public officer, and is exercising that power in derogation not only of the dignity and rights of this House, but in derogation of the express language of the Constitution.

Mr. BASS. I took the ground when I addressed the committee a few moments ago that the Congressional Printer was a public officer of the United States, and that his election by the Senate did not make him a Senate officer; but that the Senate was vested with the power of determining who should be the Congressional Printer, and that the object of the amendment is simply to transfer the selection from the Senate to the President of the United States.

But the character of the officer and the tenure of the office was in no degree changed by it except as to the person or body making the designation; that was transferred from the President to the Senate.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the gentleman agree with me that this officer cannot constitutionally be elected by the Senate?

Mr. BASS. I do not; for I cannot suppose the House of Representatives and the Senate in 1867 would have passed an unconstitutional law.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If gentlemen will look at the clause of the Constitution, on the eighteenth page of the Manual, for themselves, all doubt on this matter will be removed.

Mr. DAWES. After the colloquy between myself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] I desire to say a word. The present incumbent of the office is, so far as I know, above reproach, and certainly is entirely satisfactory to me, and in my support of this amendment I have no desire to reflect upon him. I was opposed to the passage of a law which surrendered to the Senate a power which belonged either to both Houses of Congress, or to the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and I think the latter was very clearly the proper mode of appointment.

Formerly each House had its own Congressional Printer. There was a House Printer, elected by the House, and a Senate Printer, elected by the Senate. Since then it has been deemed wise to consolidate the offices in one. It is impracticable to have a concurrent election, even if it were authorized by the Constitution. The election must either be, practically, by this branch or the other branch, or by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The two branches would very likely be at loggerheads over the appointment, and would be without any officer. When the two offices were consolidated it became necessary, in the nature of the case, that the officer should be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The law which this amendment proposes to repeal was passed because there was a condition of things here at the time which led some members of Congress to think that it was safer to surrender the prerogatives of this House, one after the other, to the Senate, holding a perpetual session, than it was to run other risks which seemed to them great, without stopping to think that when they were once surrendered they could never be regained. I hope this amendment will prevail, and that this state of things from time to time will be corrected. It must be done, if done at all, in an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that debate may cease upon this paragraph of the bill; if not I shall move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to continue the debate, but I desire to have read an extract from the opinion of ex-Attorney-General Akerman, which is very short.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield for that purpose if it is understood by unanimous consent that the vote shall be taken after it is read.

No objection was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Viewing the appointing power conferred in the Constitution as a substantial, and not merely a nominal, function, I cannot but believe that the judgment and will of the constitutional depositary of that power should be exercised in every appointment. The power was lodged where it is because the makers of the Constitution, after careful consideration, thought that in no other depositaries of it could the judgment and the will to make proper appointments so certainly be found. They assigned it to functionaries who were expected to have an adequate knowledge of men and of affairs, to have capacity for public business, and to feel responsible to conscience, and to the opinion of good citizens. As a further security, they placed the power in the hands of those who would have a particular interest in using it well. If a legislative body is ill-officered, the members cannot do their work with ease or advantage; therefore, each branch of Congress chooses its officers. Without efficient servitors, a court of law is impotent; therefore, Congress may vest appointments in courts. The first need of the head of a Department is a body of capable and trusty assistants; therefore Congress may vest appointments in the heads of Departments. In all cases not thus provided for the appointment is with the President, whose success in his weighty charge essentially depends on the competency of the appointees. Thus the reasons for the constitutional provision all forbid that any judgment and will but those of the constitutional appointing power should have legal operation in the matter of the appointment.

The most important civil appointments are made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. If Congress can compel the President to nominate a person selected by others, it can compel the Senate to advise and consent to that nomination.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. BASS; and it was not agreed to—ayes 41, noes not counted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. HALE, of New York; and it was agreed to—ayes 103, noes not counted.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph be passed over for the present, in view of the fact that matters in relation to the public printing are being investigated; and I think it is the purpose of some of the members of the Committee on Appropriations to prepare an amendment which will be more satisfactory than the bill as it now stands.

Mr. STORM. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call up the miscellaneous item which was passed over, and that will conclude all our back work.

The Clerk read the item, as follows:

For miscellaneous items, $28,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. We agreed last night to go back to this item when some statistics were obtained. I now have those statistics. The expenditure out of the miscellaneous appropriation for the last year was $66,385.78. That miscellaneous item included contested-election cases, for which we paid $28,187.10 during the last year; but in the appropriation bill of last year a proviso was inserted that hereafter contested-election cases should not be paid out of the contingent fund. It is for that reason that we were enabled to reduce the amount considerably. The estimate was made for $50,000. The committee thought we could safely reduce it to $28,000. I am in doubt whether we may not have cut too deep; but I do not think that $28,000 is a larger sum than will be absolutely needed. There are other items that are now left in the miscellaneous fund. In the first place the cost of the investigations ordered by the House—of course a joint investigation would not come under this appropriation—but all the expenses of House investigating committees are paid out of the miscellaneous fund; those expenses include the cost of witnesses, the cost of subpœnaing witnesses and paying their mileage. This item also includes the item of funeral expenses of members and officers of the House; the articles furnished for the committee-rooms and the store-rooms, and which are not specially provided for under the head of furniture; any special demand for a police force on the occasion of a funeral, an inauguration, or other public ceremony. In general, all these miscellaneous expenses that cannot be specifically anticipated and provided for are paid out of this fund. For many years the miscellaneous expenses have never been so low as it is now proposed to make them, $28,000. I call the attention of the committee to the following statement from the Clerk's office of how this miscellaneous fund was expended during the past year:

Amounts paid out of miscellaneous item of the contingent fund, House of Representatives, for fiscal year ending June 30, 1873.

To members on account of contested-election cases, under resolutions of the House	$28,187 10
On account of investigations ordered by the House, including expenses of members of committees, mileage, per diem of witnesses, cost of subpœnaing	13,000 60
Amounts paid under resolution to defray burial expenses, &c., of members and employés	5,956 15
Articles furnished for store-room, committee-rooms, &c	4,762 05
Messengers and others not properly paid from any other fund	2,959 52
Capitol policemen stationed at garden	2,376 00
Copyright of Barclay's Digest	2,000 00
Ice	773 44
Washing towels, curtains, &c., for bath-rooms, committee-rooms, and offices	728 09
	60,741 35
Miscellaneous, such as winding clocks, strap for bills, postage, calls of the House, repairs, &c	5,644 43
Total	66,385 78

Mr. DONNAN. I withdraw the amendment which I offered on yesterday to this portion of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask unanimous consent to recur to line 180 of this bill as printed, for the purpose of moving to insert after the word "mails" the words "and for one saddle-horse for messenger." That will make the provision for the House correspond with the provision already adopted with regard to the Senate. We have cut off the supply of horses, but it is important that one horse should be allowed for what we call our riding-page service for the House, as has already been done for the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asks unanimous consent to recur to line 180 for the purpose stated by him.

Mr. CONGER. Before objecting I wish to make a remark. I understand from decisions of our Speaker that the object of considering a bill in Committee of the Whole is to give an opportunity for all amendments to be offered that any member may desire to propose. I deny the right of this committee to make any determination by any rule or order inside of the committee which shall prevent any member of the committee from moving an amendment to any portion of this bill. The House may make that determination, but the committee cannot do it.

I rose on yesterday to propose an amendment to this bill, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] objected to going back, because the committee had made a determination in regard to it which I say the committee had no power to make. I do not object to going back in this case; but I take the first opportunity I have had to be recognized by the Chair to protest against any decision of the Chair which prevents any member of this committee from moving, in accordance with the decisions of our Speaker, any amendment to any portion of this bill before it is reported to the House. I deny that this committee can establish any rule which will prevent any member doing that. Any order of this committee by unanimous consent declaring that a clause shall be treated as a paragraph, that it shall not be in order to go back to a paragraph after it has been passed, is in violation of the rules of the House, and in distinct violation of the decisions by our Speaker, which decisions I think are correct. I do not object now to the gentleman from Ohio going back, although yesterday he arose in his place and objected to any other member of this committee going back to move an amendment. It is his example to which I now object, and not the amendment which he proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Where a bill is being considered by clauses or sections, and the committee has passed from the consideration of a particular clause or section, it is not in order to recur thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] raises the point of order, the Chair will be compelled to decide that it is not in order to recur to a portion of the bill which has been passed.

Mr. CONGER. I do not raise the point. I say there is no power in this committee under the rules to direct a bill to be reported back to the House until every member of the committee has had an opportunity to offer amendments to any portion of the bill.

The amendment of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Library of Congress:

For compensation of the Librarian, $4,000; and for fourteen assistant librarians, three at $2,500 each, two at $1,800 each, one at $1,600, two at $1,440 each, three at $1,200 each, two at $1,000 each, and one at $960 per annum; in all, $26,140.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I desire to inquire if there is any reduction of the number of employés in the Librarian's department?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a reduction of the appropriation, which last year was $30,061, and this year it is $26,140.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I do not see that the compensation of any of the employés has been reduced.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is so.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the following:

For purchase of books for the Library, $8,000; for purchase of law books for the Library, $2,000; for purchase of files of periodicals and newspapers, $1,500; for expenses of exchanging public documents for the publications of foreign governments, $1,500.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the clause for the purchase of law-books the following:

For completing the collection of British local history, $2,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that in order?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is clearly in order, for it is in continuation of an appropriation made last year on the same subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regards the amendment as in order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Last year Congress appropriated the sum of $5,000 to enable the Librarian to purchase a complete collection of English local history. These local histories, country and town histories, are becoming rare in England. They are of immense importance to the students of American history. The origin of all our town and municipal governments, so far as they are derived from England, all matters of family history, and the history of our institutions so far as they are local, are to be found in these local histories of England. Mr. Spofford has exhausted the sum of $5,000 appropriated last year, and there is still necessary for the completion of his collection this further small sum which I have proposed. This proposition had the unanimous consent of the Committee of the Whole last year, and I hope it will meet with no objection now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it appears that this was a matter of appropriation in the last Congress; and I then indulged in a prediction that the sum appropriated would not be the last we should hear of the subject. I understand that every valuable fact embraced in these documents has long since been obtained by private enterprise; that the Astor Library of New York contains the record of every fact that will be furnished through the agency of this appropriation, and it was so stated, I think, in the Committee of the Whole at the last session.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There was then no debate on the proposition at all. The Committee of the Whole assented to it, and it went through without any discussion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I am confounding this matter with a proposition to obtain certain French archives.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from Indiana is thinking of those French documents.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had reference to some investigation made into matters in the French archives, to ascertain certain facts bearing on our history. This, however, seems to be a different matter; but it is clearly suited for purely private enterprise. I do not see any good reason why Congress should enter upon a work which, in the nature of things, belongs to the private enterprise of the country. I do not think public money should be spent for such purposes. An appropriation of $5,000 having been passed at the last session without objection, the allowance must now be increased. The trouble is that we can never know the limits of such an appropriation. If this were a matter pertaining to the Government, and one which private enterprise could not carry out, I should not object; but I do object to the Government going into business, year after year, in connection with the publication of books, belonging legitimately to private enterprise and calculated to benefit a comparatively shall portion of the people.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. This appropriation is not for the purchase of documents to be published by the Government. It is to complete the most important historical department of the Congressional Library by adding to it a set of those English histories from which all our institutions are so largely derived. I cannot conceive that anybody who thinks we should have a public library at all can hesitate to admit that the library should be complete, so far as possible, in this particular direction. The $5,000 appropriated last year is exhausted. M. Spofford, the Librarian, thinks that a small additional appropriation of $2,000 will complete the collection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. Inasmuch as this enterprise has been entered upon, I have no objection that the sum necessary for the purpose should be expended out of the appropriation provided for in this clause.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Indiana will allow me, I would suggest to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] that he can accomplish the purpose he desires by inserting after the word "dollars" in line 210 these words: "not more than $2,000 of which shall be used for the purchase of English local histories."

Mr. HOLMAN. In that form, I would have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me that this being an appropriation for a special purpose, it should be in addition to the regular appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have restricted the appropriation in this bill to what we give annually for the growth of the Library; and as a large share of these county histories has already been obtained, I think that less than $2,000 will complete the collection.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the chairman of the committee will consent as a compromise to make the aggregate $9,000 and then to insert the amendment he has indicated, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Personally I have no objection to that.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suggest that the clause be amended so as to appropriate $9,000, of which not more than $2,000 shall be applied to the completion of the collection of British local histories.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist upon any appropriation beyond the $8,000 contained in the bill. We are making now very heavy appropriations for keeping up the Library. We all feel a pride in the work; but it is a very grave element of expense. We should not expend more in this direction than is absolutely necessary. According to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I move to amend the amendment so as to insert after the appropriation of $8,000 contained in the bill the words "not more than $2,000 of which shall be expended for completing the collection of British local histories."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I withdraw my amendment and accept that of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I do not want to get into a contest over this matter.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of the President of the United States, $50,000.

Mr. DAWES. I move pro forma to amend the clause just read by striking out the last word. A day or two since my colleague, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who is not now in his seat, called attention to a remark which I made when the salary bill was before the House, that the perquisites of the President, in addition to his salary, amounted to $50,000. I have had occasion to notice that some remarks which I then made without premeditation or previous preparation have been misconstrued into a charge that the President himself was in the personal receipt of $50,000 more or less in the nature of perquisites in addition to his salary. What I said upon that occasion in reference to the present incumbent of the office (and which I do not care to repeat) was, as I then thought and still think, sufficient to absolve me, as I know it has been so held, from any disposition to reflect upon the course of the present incumbent. But I desire to be put exactly right in relation to the office. On looking back to what I then said,

I find that I did use in the first part of my remarks the word "perquisites;" and I do not think that it was the proper word for me to use or that it conveyed my idea. I spoke of the presidential office, though I saw before I got through that I was understood to mean perquisites of the President himself.

I went on further to state that I referred to the expenses of the President's household and house. What I really meant to say and what I was discussing would have been more properly expressed as the incidental expenses of the presidential establishment, some of which of course are personal to himself but many of which appertain to his office. I used words at that time which I supposed would leave it to be understood my reference was to the expenses of the whole executive establishment. Some of them were the expenses of the President himself and some were exclusively those of the President's establishment. I think they all ought to be fixed by law. The President's salary itself should embrace everything which the Congress of the United States may deem should be payment to the President for his own services, and what belongs to the executive office should be fixed independently of the President's salary. I desire now simply to move this pro forma amendment so as to make perfectly clear what my meaning was, so that hereafter whatever I said then may not be construed as any intimation on my part that the present incumbent was himself in receipt personally of the sum which I said at that time, which, speaking simply from my memory, amounted to very nearly the sum of $50,000.

Since my colleague the other day called the attention of the House to the fact, I have taken the pains to look up the appropriations which are properly termed incidental expenses of the executive establishment itself, and I wish to read them. There were appropriated last year under this head, as follows:

Furnace-keeper	$720
Two policemen	2,640
One night watchman	900
Usher	1,200
Two door-keepers	2,400
Steward	2,000
Messenger	1,200
Secretary and clerk	10,600
Contingent expenses	6,000
Annual repairs of White House	15,000
Refurnishing White House	10,000
Fuel	5,000
	57,660

There are one or two items which it is impossible for me to include in this. One is the gas for the Executive Mansion, which is included in the aggregate for public buildings including the Presidential Mansion; another is for the care of the greenhouse belonging to the Presidential Mansion. That is included in the appropriation for permanent improvements of the greenhouse, together with the care of it, $10,000. I did not put them in. Every member of the House can see many of these are exclusively for the executive establishment. Ten thousand dollars for annual repair of the White House, may be more or may be less for different years, and so for refurnishing the White House, $10,000. If you compare the President to any other public officer, he would of course have to keep his own private house in repair and keep it furnished at his own expense. Still, whatever construction is put upon the remarks I made, which would include his own personal receipt of expenditures properly belonging to the executive office, is a construction of my remarks which I did not intend to have put upon them, and which I did not put upon them myself. I therefore take this opportunity to make the matter plain, so that hereafter there may be no misconstruction of what I really did not mean to say. I adhere to what I said in reference to the presidential salary on that occasion and to what I intended to say in regard to the incidental expenses of the presidential establishment, and simply rise on this occasion to make clear the use of words which I should not perhaps have indulged in if I had studied and prepared beforehand the remarks I made. I now withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] yielded the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and he is now entitled to the floor if he claims it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to be heard on this formal motion, but I do desire the floor to submit an amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to reply to my colleague before the amendment is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I renew it. I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, the statement which has been made by my colleague is exactly correct. I was myself misled by what he said, and I think if he will cast his eye upon the question I put to him at that time he will see it is quite natural I should be misled, because I supposed I called his attention to the point he now makes.

I am one of those persons who never have been able to see any answer to the argument which has been made by my colleague from the Essex district in favor of raising the President's salary from $25,000 to $50,000. He said very truly that the $25,000 which was established in the beginning of the Government is not as much as $100,000 now; while at the beginning of the Government the demands upon the President's hospitality were infinitely less, and the appropriations made for contingent expenses were very much greater. But it seems to me that raising the salary to $50,000 should not be accompanied by a feeling in the public mind that the President is getting, in the way of services in his family of persons who are paid for out of the public Treasury or in the way of the use of public property, for any private purposes whatever, a very much larger sum than the salary which is fixed by law. It seemed to me that the statement of my colleague, who I understood investigated the matter, was that such a condition of things existed. And when he addressed the House at that time I rose and, with his leave, called his attention to the fact that his words could not fail to have great importance attached to them by the country. I therefore addressed the question to him in regard to the matter, and, as he says, I was misled by his reply.

But the substance of this thing is this: It is a very small matter in itself whether the President of the United States or any other public officer gets the use of a carriage which is not his, or the use of the service of a man that is not his; but it is a very grave matter whether the people of the United States believe that there are vague and large and indefinite expenditures made here for the improper and unlawful and unaccounted-for use of public property. Now the way to avoid that evil, which is a great one, is to have whatever is appropriated for this purpose distinctly expressed. We should have the President's salary distinctly expressed and fixed at a liberal sum in conformity with the dignity of the office. Then for the White House, for its furnishing, for its warming, for its ornamentation, for everything which is necessary to keep the state toward the representatives of foreign countries and toward the American people, which is imposed by our customs on that office, we should pay; but in paying for those purposes it should be done by distinct and easily understood appropriations.

The people of the United States like and expect when they come to Washington to find a magnificent Capitol, in which their representatives meet, and they do not grudge the expenses. They like and expect to find a room where the President receives the American people which gratifies their taste, which is something not merely of comfort, but of splendor. When President Grant receives the crowd of citizens in the rooms at the White House, he gets as little of personal comfort or pleasure out of that evening's work as the humblest citizen, of whatever race, of whatever color, of whatever employment, to whom its doors are open.

My colleague [Mr. DAWES] I am glad agrees with me that we should not impute expenditures for this purpose to the salary of the President. They are expenditures for the gratification of the American people in visiting their official chief. I have introduced an amendment which will be in order at the close of this bill, which provides not for any appropriation for this purpose, but which provides that every civil officer, from the President down, shall use only such public property and the services of such public officers as are expressly appropriated to his use by law. And then I do not think that if that is done my distinguished colleague himself will fail to see that there are very grave public reasons for leaving the salary of the President of the United States at a larger sum than $25,000 if the other object can be accomplished.

Mr. DAWES. I merely wish to add, Mr. Chairman, that I have not sought the floor to modify in any respect the views I have heretofore expressed in regard to the President's salary.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] yield further to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES?]

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I desire just one moment to say that I do not desire to revive that debate. The reasons I have for adhering to those views in reference to the President's salary grew out of the condition of things in the country and the necessity of keeping down salaries.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether these appropriations for the executive establishment are any larger than they have uniformly been during his long continued term of service in this House?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield further?

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to answer the question which has been put to him.

Mr. DAWES. I do not remember any that have been increased lately. The appropriations for repairs and for furniture of course vary; they are sometimes more and sometimes less. The others are just what they have been year after year for the last fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. FORT. Do not all these appropriations go to the clerks, the secretaries, the persons for whom they are made, and not to the President himself, at all?

Mr. DAWES. There is not one of them which goes directly into the pocket of the President. Some of them—any one can see by looking at the language—go to pay men whom he would otherwise be obliged to pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment raising a constitutional question that has never had a hearing in this House up to this time.

I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "$50,000," and insert "$25,000;" so it will read: "For compensation of the President of the United States, $25,000."

I offer the amendment for the sole purpose of raising the question as to the constitutionality of the law of the 3d of March, 1873, by which the salary of the Chief Executive was increased.

It is clear, Mr. Chairman, that in the bill of the 3d of March, 1873, increasing salaries, as to all salaries except two, that of the Chief Executive and the judicial salaries, the power of Congress over the subject-matter was complete, and that power has always been exercised. It is clear that Congress does not possess the power to reduce the salaries of the judiciary for a very manifest and wise reason. But the question I desire to present is whether Congress possessed the power during, not the term, but the period of the tenure of the presidential office, either to increase or to diminish the salary? I hold that by the terms of the Constitution the act passed on the 3d of March, 1873, was in conflict with that provision which prohibits Congress from either increasing or diminishing the presidential salary during the period for which the office shall be held by any given citizen. The language of the Constitution is not ambiguous. I read from page 17 of the Digest:

The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Mark the word "period." My friend says four years. I answer that is the "term" of the presidential office. The Constitution here carefully uses a different word, not the word "term" which is used everywhere else in the instrument, but the word "period," which has a wider signification. The object of the Constitution manifestly was this, that the President of the United States, while holding the office, should not upon the one hand be influenced by the action of Congress through a fear of the reduction of his salary, nor upon the other hand should his conduct be at all affected by what might be the action of Congress in increasing his salary. The object was to make the President absolutely independent of Congress so far as the question of his salary was concerned. And, sir, I submit that on the 3d day of March, 1873, when the incumbent of the executive office was closing one term and entering upon another term, the whole eight years together constituting the "period" within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution, the purpose of the Constitution was operating in full force to prevent Congress from exercising a power over the President so far as it might be affected by reducing his salary or increasing it.

Now while it has been impossible heretofore to arrest the attention of Congress to this subject, it is, it seems to me, a question which has been very carefully considered by the country. If the Constitution meant, as I assume it did, that during the period of the presidential office the power should not be exercised by Congress either to increase or diminish his salary, then it is very clear that Congress did an unconstitutional act in making this increase, and should retrace its steps.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not propose to discuss the constitutional question raised by the gentleman from Indiana, because while I do not agree with him, I believe that this is a place where that discussion is futile. I only want to say in a few words as to these expenditures that gather about the Presidential Mansion, and to state the line that has been pursued by the Committee on Appropriations in recommending the appropriation of these sums of money. Several gentlemen have asked me whether there is anything in these appropriations relating to the President's office and the Executive Mansion that goes to cover what should be individual or family expenses, and my answer to that is clear and distinct that there is nothing of that kind. The committee has pursued this line: We assume, and I hear of nobody that objects, that a presidential mansion is to be provided for the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. It has been so from the earliest days of our history. There are articles of property in that Presidential Mansion belonging to the Government, the furniture and other things, that when one President moves out are left there and remain for the use of his successor.

Now the Government having that matter in its charge, owning the property and putting the President into the house, furnishes certain officials with reference to that property. For instance, during the day when business is going on and members of Congress and others are doing business there, it furnishes, as it does at all the Departments, men at the doors, men who wait upon and attend upon gentlemen who there do business. All of these relate to the business of the executive department, and are only such as other Government officials have.

Now, sir, we come to the inside of the house; and the only officer in any way brought in relation to the family of the President that is paid for by the Government is the steward, and he is an officer of the Government; not an employé of the President, but one who is under bonds. It is a bonded office. He gives bonds securing the Government for the charge and custody of the property there. He is an officer, and I hold that he should be an officer. He is accountable to us; he gives bonds to us; he should be paid by us.

Beyond that I may state here, and I have good authority for what I state, and I state it distinctly and clearly, because I know that some gentlemen have been told that all through the household and domestic affairs of the White House we are paying the bills, I state that there is no person aside from those that come within the rule I have stated whose compensation is paid by the Government. That is as it should be, and that is as it is.

Now as to the furniture and as to rooms; we furnish the house such as it is, with furniture such as it is. We furnish the Capitol building, the Treasury building, the State Department, and all other Government buildings. If there is any gentleman who has been to the White House and believes that the President and his family have superior accommodations, superior furniture, better, larger, and superior rooms than scores and hundreds of private gentlemen throughout the country have, then he looks upon it with different eyes from what I do. If there is any extravagance in any Department of the Government, here or elsewhere, I am sure it is not found at the White House in its management. There are no extensive rooms there. The original design of the building has been perverted. We furnish no office outside of the building for business to be done by the Executive; and that which was meant as the home of the President and his family has been taken, more than the half of it, for the public convenience, and the President and his family have been huddled into the other part. I know that with reference to these officials the line I have indicated has been followed, and the Government has paid for nothing in the way of personal perquisites of the President.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not intend by any means to enter into any defense of the economy of the White House or of its occupants. But I do desire to call careful attention to what fell from my colleague [Mr. DAWES] some time ago, and to how it has struck the country. I know he did not intend it should be so, but it has been so.

The statement was made here by him that the presidential office yields to its incumbent $400,000 during a term. That was the statement as it has gone to the country. To support that assertion my colleague has put forward the items which go to make up the odd $50,000 a year besides the salary. The first item is for a furnace-keeper, $720. He keeps the furnace which warms the whole building used for an executive office.

Mr. GARFIELD. And we have one here.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have three here in the Capitol, and there is one in each of the Department buildings. The second item is for two policemen. Now I suppose the President does not want two policemen to watch him. I do not think that if he had his choice he would keep a private policeman. They are to watch the grounds; and besides that we put an extra watchman in the square opposite his house to keep people from depredating upon it. The next item is one night watchman. What is he for? To keep the house, which is the house of the people, from burning up. No private gentleman would keep a night watchman. Another item is an usher. Who is he? He is the man that shows the East Room. Counting for three months, four hundred men, women, and children per day go in and out of that room, and I think that would keep him reasonably busy. I do not think the President gets much out of him.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. A gentleman on my left asks in reference to a night usher. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] explain that, and relieve me from the necessity of making the explanation?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will allow the gentleman to explain. But the night usher is not here in this list. There are two door-keepers. What are they for? They are to let the people in and out and to see that improper people do not get in there. And by improper people I mean crazy people, for it is one species of insanity, the idea that some crazy men have, that they must force their way into the President's House. There have been a great many people who have come to Washington for the very purpose of going into the President's House and seeing the President. That is an insane delusion.

And there are other improper people. Why, sir, there has to be a watchman in the East Room to prevent some people who go in there from cutting mementoes from the curtains. That has been done over and over again. Pieces have been cut out of the damask curtains with scissors to be carried off and made into pin-cushions as mementoes of the White House. Therefore a watchman is required there, not for the benefit of the President, but for the benefit of the people whose property that is and of the Treasury that must provide for that house.

Then there is a steward. What is the use of a steward? There did not use to be any steward. But it was found that when one President went out of the House and another came in, every man that had access to the White House between times carried off the furniture and ornaments and various things of value, and scandal arose. It was said that the President carried off those things, because they were not found there when the succeeding President came in.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor and said: I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A great scandal arose because sometimes furniture was missing, and it was said the outgoing President had carried it off. Therefore the steward, who is a bonded officer and who gives receipts for every article in the house, and is made responsible in the matter, has been provided by law in order to save this furniture.

Next is the messenger. He is the messenger of the public office of the Executive. Next come the secretary and clerks. The President has one secretary and two clerks. Why, sir, you give to every head of a Department an Assistant-Secretary and three or four clerks.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The Ways and Means Committee have two.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] reminds me that the Ways and Means Committee have a clerk, a secretary, and two messengers. Now I never think of charging those to my colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the committee, as his private perquisites.

Then come contingent expenses, $6,000. What are they? Postage, stationery, and every other contingent expense of that very large establishment; and no dollar of that goes through the President's hands. It is disbursed through the bonded officer whose business it is to see that it is properly expended. The next item is "annual repairs of the White House, $15,000." Now, sir, there are no annual repairs of the White House to the amount of $15,000. When the East Room was found to be breaking down, the floor and other timbers rotting away, the whole thing was remodeled and repaired at an expense of $15,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. A ton of plastering fell in that room at one time last year, and would have killed a great many people if there had been a reception at the time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; the whole plastering of that immense room fell down, and serious loss of life would have happened if persons had been in the room at the time. That room was remodeled and repaired.

Now, sir, the White House is not only the Executive Mansion; it contains the executive offices, furnished for the use of the President, as they have been from the beginning of the Government. Is it fair to charge the repairs of that building as a perquisite of the President?

The next item is, "refurnishing the White House." Is that a perquisite of the President any more than the furnishing of this Hall, which is done every year more or less, is a perquisite of ours? Are these desks our perquisites? Is this carpet our perquisite? The President cannot take away one dollar's worth of the furniture of the White House. He has nothing to do with it except to use it and turn it over to his successor; and he uses such as is given to him.

The last item is, "fuel, $5,000." Do you suppose it takes $5,000 to warm the President? What is done with that fuel? Why sir, the greenhouse, which is established by act of Congress, which the President does not see half as often as do visitors coming to Washington, which hundreds frequent to look at the flowers and to get slips—where every society in this city, whenever there is any benevolent undertaking on foot, obtains all the flowers it wants—this greenhouse is heated out of the $5,000; all the executive offices are heated out of it, and that immense East Room is heated out of it. Is it fair to charge the expenditures for these purposes as a perquisite of the President? By no means; and my colleague said he did not mean to be so understood.

The reason I have gone over this matter so carefully is, that these items have gone out to the country as perquisites of the executive office, and without the explanation would not be understood. I may say that many of these items tend rather to the discomfort of the President than his advantage. Some of these appropriations have been made heretofore in far larger amounts than now. There has been substantially no increase for a great many years. As I have said heretofore, the Government formerly furnished very many more things to the President than is done now. Horses, carriages, wagons, harness, saddles, bridles, holsters, pistols—various things which are not furnished now—were furnished in the olden time. All the items substantially to which I have referred have passed through this House this morning in the reading of this bill, and nobody objected; and I only desire to say here, so that it may go on record, that these items have nothing to do with the expenses of the President.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the gentleman ever taken the trouble to make an estimate of the cost (if I may so say) of the Presidency now, as compared with the expenses in General Washington's time, including the salary and the payment of the various attachments to the office, without taking into account the difference in the value of money?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have made such an examination. In Washington's time—in the first year, I think, of his administration—there was allowed $10,000 to furnish the President's house, a house which was hired for the purpose. The actual allowances for the use of the President in Washington's time were almost double what they are now, and at a time, too, when fifty cents was the daily wages of a skilled workman of the same grade that now receives four dollars or five dollars a day. This is what was done in those days by a great nation for its Chief Magistrate.

Why, sir, I hear every day the claim that we ought to return to the "simplicity of our fathers." I happen to have here a statement of the "simplicity of our fathers." There was a "Jenkins" in those days as there is now. Let me begin with one of our "mothers:"

Miss Peggy Harding appeared, lovely and radiant as a cloud touched with soft sunset-light, in a white mantua silk fringed with gold," a petticoat of pale blue brocade, blue satin shoes with court heels, and white silk hose clocked with gold. This sumptuous lady's handkerchief was also wrought with gold, and is said to have cost not less than thirty dollars—

Considering that the pay of a skilled workman was then fifty cents a day, thirty dollars then would be equivalent to about $600 now—head-dress of ostrich plumes, blue, white, and pale yellow; hair profusely powdered; gloves of white kid, buttoned to the elbow and wrought with gold; fan of curious Chinese workmanship, prodigiously admired.

Who were the distinguished gentlemen present? I ask the attention of my democratic friends:

Of the distinguished gentlemen present the most conspicuous was perhaps Mr. Thomas Jefferson, in a long-waisted white cloth coat, the height of the ton, scarlet vest, black satin breeches, highly polished painted shoes, with silver buckles and white silk hose. As he entered the court of Terpsichore he removed from a slightly powdered wig a peaked cocked hat of the latest fashion. Fastened to the lapel of the coat was a nosegay of sweet-smelling posies.

I now commend to my colleague John Hancock, of Massachusetts, the gentleman who made such an immense signature on the Declaration of Independence:

Mr. John Hancock also attracted much admiration, especially from the fair sex. He wore a coat of fine scarlet cloth, blue satin breeches, with white silk hose, a full-powdered wig—à la Louis Seize—with frizzled side-locks, and a cocked hat with a black cockade. His ruffles were of the finest French lace, and his shoe-buckles of brilliant paste.

I imagine our colleague and friend from the Quaker City dressed up like this, for this is in Philadelphia and is a Quaker performance.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is when they drew it "mild."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I read further:

Our respected fellow-citizen James Harrison wore an entire suit of drab cloth, richly trimmed with silk lace.

I think they followed the fashion of that time, and we ought to now follow the fashion of ours—of comfort and convenience—and give an outfit worthy of the President of a nation rich and powerful enough to maintain its place among the nations of the earth.

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say a word.

Mr. COX. I will not occupy the floor for more than a few minutes. I do not wish to interfere between the two distinguished gentlemen from Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last word only to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COX. Then I renew it. I supposed, Mr. Chairman, the difference which existed between my friend from Massachusetts and the other over yonder had been harmonized by some little local issues pending in that State. I was surprised, therefore, to find this little divergence of views. I am surprised my friend on my right yonder should have taken back so many wise and good things he has said heretofore on economy.

I do not propose now to discuss the constitutional question referred to by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] but I do propose to say here all that was read by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts about the prodigality and luxury of that early day, about George Washington and John Hancock and the other federalists, does not affect the frugality, the honesty, and the incorruptibility of the honest men who served the public then on small salaries. It does not affect the men who are now serving the public on small salaries. If they are dressed thus and so, I say I do not care how men are dressed. I do not care for sumptuary laws. I would not care if my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] should come in here in a sky-blue pair of pantaloons and address the House. It would add to the attraction. I am indifferent about the dressing.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do say this, that at this time when we are aggrandizing power at this Federal center, when we have given to the Federal Government the post-office power, the banking power, the insurance power, the railroad power, and dozens of Bureaus, until we are a central bureaucracy, we ought to guard carefully against adding any more power or luxury to the present Federal power at Washington.

It was said by a distinguished editor of New York, who was here the other day and made a lecture on his return to New York, that it seems everybody in the States desires to come here and perform some Federal function. The governors of the States only become local magistrates in order to become United States Senators. All our architecture, all the grandeur of this city, tends to detract from the old democratic idea of frugal, simple, and honest government which the people are demanding. And I am the more surprised, therefore, my simple-hearted, honest, and frugal friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yonder should have been more or less disinclined in the present emergency to take back something he said on this subject, and said so well. I will read what I saw in a paper the other day to account for this extraordinary proceeding here to day:

Some one remarked to BUTLER the other day that DAWES's speech had been printed in pamphlet form by the democratic executive committee of Connecticut, and scattered broadcast throughout the State. "What is its effect?" he asked. "Bad for the republican party, General." BUTLER studied awhile, and made answer: "Let me tell you one thing; when an old brindled steer like DAWES gets into the habit of breaking out of the pound every night when it is dark or drizzly, there is no cornfield in the country safe.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want "laughter" put in here, for that is against the order of the House as made by the Speaker on the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] But what was the reply?

He knows too many of our secrets, sir, and by—

I know the profanity is not that of the gentleman named—

he must have a bell hung about his neck.

Who is the man to bell the gentleman from Massachusetts? Let him step forth and do it. Nobody but himself, and he has done it to-day.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I give notice that when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] gets through I shall call for a vote.

Mr. DAWES. I have a word to say in the first place to my colleague on my right, [Mr. BUTLER.] He is never so distinguished in debate as when he makes his own issue and makes his own unvarnished statement of facts. One who came in here and listened to the statement of my colleague just now would have supposed that he was arraigning me for an attack on the character of appropriations for the Presidential Mansion. No word, at any time, has fallen from my lips in reference to the character or reasonableness of a single appropriation for the Presidential Mansion. With the ability which my colleague possesses, I have always been in the habit, in debate with him, to let him deliver his own issues to his heart's content. But I venture to call him back now to what I have said this morning in reference to remarks which I made upon the salary bill. They were simply that when I spoke of the perquisites of the presidential office I had no reference to the personal perquisites of the President himself in the ordinary acceptation of the term; that I had reference to appropriations for the Presidential Mansion, the executive establishment, and I recited those for two purposes: one to show that I was correct in saying that they ranged from nearly $50,000, the other for the very purpose of bringing them to the attention of the House to show their character, that they were reasonable and fair; not for the purpose of taking back one word I said in reference to them, but for the purpose of explaining and showing that the public had put a wrong construction upon those words. If the public had read, or anybody had read through all I had said, they would have found that when my colleague on my left [Mr. G. F. HOAR] called my attention to it I used these words:

I have shown these facts.

I said in reply to my colleague:

I have taken from the appropriation bill what has been appropriated for the President's household and house just what would be expended by any official who hires his own house; not the cost of the house, but the yearly appropriations for carrying it on——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DAWES. Wait till I get through:

and keeping it in order and repair.

My object to-day—and that was the only legitimate reply to me which my colleague could make—my object to-day was to show that I ought to have been a little more explicit in these words, and to have made a distinction between what was personal to the President and what went to the carrying on of the executive establishment. That was all. Yet my colleague launched out, making his own issue, into an arraignment of me for saying that these appropriations for the executive establishment were unreasonable, and entering into an argument interspersed with arraignments of me, and trying to show that I to-day held up to the country these appropriations as unreasonable. And holding his issue as he saw fit, before he got through, my colleague found himself discussing the beauties of some Jenkins's descriptions of a ball a hundred years ago. So much for my colleague.

Allow me now to say a word to the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] He regrets I have taken back to-day what I have said on former occasions about economy. Will the gentleman from New York tell the word I have taken back? The gentleman from New York has found it more convenient to intimate that I took back what I say than to meet what I do say. On a former occasion, some four or five years ago, I had to say in this House something in reference to economy that cost me a great many hard kicks around about the country. And I had occasion to go to New Hampshire to make a speech about six weeks after I had made that speech on this floor. The gentleman from New York, three or four days, or very shortly after I came back, announced in this House that I had taken back in New Hampshire what I had said here on this floor. The speech I made in New Hampshire was reported word for word, without any correction in that particular, just as I uttered it. It is at the service of the gentleman from New York, or of any other gentleman who says I took back one single word of what I said here upon this floor. I took back no word of it. I reasserted in the hall in Nashua, New Hampshire, in one hour after I reached that city, just exactly what I said here, and it is reported in the papers of New Hampshire just as I here uttered it; and there is just as much foundation for saying that I took that back as for saying that I have here to-day taken back one word I have uttered upon the subject of economy.

Mr. COX. Did the gentleman not say in New Hampshire that the republicans had stolen more in one year than Buchanan's whole administration cost?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; and does the gentleman mean to say because I did not repeat in one evening in New Hampshire everything I ever said in this House on the subject of economy that I therefore took it back?

Mr. COX. No, sir; I did not argue in that way.

Mr. DAWES. I did not say that. This is what hurt the gentleman's feelings that I did say in New Hampshire. After having said in New Hampshire that I reasserted in that hall what I had said upon this floor, I added then that I bore from the President of the United States to the people of New Hampshire this message, that wherever it could be pointed out that a dollar could be saved to the Treasury of the United States that dollar should be saved to it. That is what I added to what I had said on this floor, but I changed nothing, and I change nothing here to-day of what I said in the speech which the gentleman says has been circulated in Connecticut or anywhere else. I do not take back anything except what is pointed out to me to be a mistake, and that I cheerfully correct anywhere and at all times.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and Mr. BUFFINTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2867) to authorize the use of certain unexpended balances for the payment of the expenses of the board of Indian commissioners.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 708) to change the name of the schooner China.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield four minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and then I shall ask for a vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to call my colleague's attention to what he said. Here it is:

Along with the $200,000 here, which, unless the law be changed, the President is hereafter to receive during his term as salary, there come perquisites that vary every year from $50,000, so that under existing law the salary and perquisites of the presidential office for a single term will amount to $400,000.

Then my colleague, Mr. G. F. HOAR, asked this question:

I wish to ask him if, in making up that sum, he has not done the same as if in stating what it costs to run this Capitol he added the interest of the money which the Capitol originally cost; and if that be so, whether his calculation is a correct or fair one?

Mr. DAWES. I have shown these facts; I have taken from the appropriation bills what has been appropriated for the President's household and his house, just what would be expended by any other official who hired his own house—not the cost of that house, but the yearly appropriations for carrying it on and keeping it in repair.

After another interrogation by Mr. HOAR, Mr. DAWES said:

That is an expenditure which, if he were put on the footing of other officials, he would, of course, be obliged to pay.

Now, then, I did not mean to arraign my colleague at all, and I am sorry he misunderstood me; I only arraigned the interpretation put upon his words.

Mr. DAWES. I had corrected that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; but it has been corrected in so gingerly a manner that I was afraid the people would not understand it. The explanation has so many "ifs" and "buts" and "ands" and "therefores," that I wanted to put it before the country expressly that these are no more personal perquisites of the President than this desk is a personal perquisite of my friend from New York [Mr. CROOKE] who sits opposite me, or than the Speaker's parlor, which is so filled with people every hour that he cannot get into it, is his personal perquisite. It would be quite as unjust to the Speaker if you should say that in addition to his salary he has a fine furnished parlor for his own personal use, as it is to say that the President in addition to his salary has a fine house furnished for his own personal use. It is the worst house that any private man ever lived in. He can have no privacy there. Two-thirds of the best part of it are taken for public offices and public show-rooms, which he neither has the use of nor can have any comfort in. I hope to see the day when we shall have an Executive Mansion and also an executive office.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and then I hope this very important matter will be disposed of.

Mr. COX. I wish to call attention in the half-minute allowed me to one fact. The sketch which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] read about the early days and in which he made a point on the democratic party for their lack of simplicity in those early days is a fancy sketch.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. COX. It was written by Grace Greenwood the other day, and published in the Washington Chronicle of April 11, 1874.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. COX. Then the gentleman put before the House for fact what was merely a fancy sketch.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; whenever I put before the House any supposed conversation from a newspaper so dirty, miserable, and vile as that which the gentleman used before the House, I will stand corrected; but not by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. What the gentleman read was a mere fancy sketch. The gentleman is a good man, I know; but he is not smart to-day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; you are neither good nor smart.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a single question.

Mr. COX. Well, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to know whether he can tell me if there are as many gold spoons in the Presidential Mansion now as "Spooney Ogle" found there when Van Buren was President?

Mr. COX. Why do not you address that question to your own side of the House; it does not belong to this side?

Mr. KELLEY. You are on a hunt for gold spoons now.

Mr. COX. I never make that sort of personal remark here, and I never will toward any member of this House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask unanimous consent that debate be closed on the pending paragraph.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand that that can be done in committee. But we can proceed to vote on the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well; let the vote be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment. I renewed it merely for the purpose of getting an opportunity to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is then on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] to reduce the appropriation for salary of the President from $50,000 to $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying——

Mr. GARFIELD. Debate upon the pending paragraph has been closed by agreement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] to object to closing the debate on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the objection was withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it was withdrawn it was not so understood here.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I did not withdraw it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nearly all the debate has been outside of this paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the committee will agree that after the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] the vote shall be taken I will not press my motion.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I insist upon my motion that the committee now rise, for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to close debate upon the pending paragraph.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 74, noes 55.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted on the motion that the committee rise, the Chair will under the rule appoint tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to save time I would suggest, then, ten minutes further time for debate be allowed on this paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not object to that.

The motion that the committee rise was withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. The pleasantries which have grown out of the consideration of the appropriations for the Executive Mansion, outside of the salary of the President, have entirely obscured the real question before the committee. In that connection I would like to call attention to this fact: that during the first year of President Johnson's administration, not supposed to be a very economical one, the contingent appropriation was limited to $4,000; while the appropriation for contingencies made by this bill is the very large amount of $60,000, or an increase in the item of contingent expenses alone of $56,000 since the first year of Johnson's administration.

A single word in reference to the question which I sought to raise: the power of Congress to increase the salary of the President during the period for which a citizen may have been or shall be elected to the presidential office. Gentlemen will observe that by the Constitution the term of the President is limited to four years. If the Constitution had provided that there should be no change in the salary of the President during the "term" for which the President shall have been elected there would seem to be no controversy, for then it would be quite clear that it referred to the period of four years. But instead of using the word "term," it uses the word "period" and the words "shall have been elected." "During the period for which he shall have been elected."

Now, can any lawyer say that the present Chief Executive had not been elected to the presidential office for the present term of four years when his salary was increased by the last Congress? And is it not also true that the present term of four years together with the last term of four years constitute the "period" during which the citizen now in office holds the presidential office? My proposition is this, as a proposition of law: that on the 3d of March, 1873, there was no more power in Congress to increase or diminish the salary of the President than there is to-day in Congress to increase or diminish the salary of the present President.

Mr. KASSON. I wish the attention of the committee for a moment or two, because I intend to vote as I presume a majority of this committee will not vote. When the question of salary was before the committee of which I was a member, the dissenting minority did not make the point which is now made. Since that time I have attempted to examine conscientiously the constitutional question involved in the raising of the President's salary, and from that examination I have been of opinion that if the question were raised here directly upon voting this $50,000, because it is required by an act of Congress, it would be necessary for me to vote against the recognition of its constitutionality.

With almost the brevity of a syllogism I can state all I wish to say upon that subject.

Abandoning the mere question of difference between the word "period" and the word "term," I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Constitution provides that the salary of the President shall not be increased nor diminished "during the period for which he shall have been elected." What were the facts connected with this question? The President had been re-elected in November. The votes were canvassed subsequently in the following session of Congress and prior to the passage of the act. The certificate had been duly authenticated that General Grant had been elected President of the United States. The time had arrived within about twelve hours at which he was to be sworn in as that President. Every preliminary act had been accomplished. What had been uncertain was made absolutely certain. The President was notified of that fact; and without sleeping one night after signing that act he was sworn into office.

Now, sir, did not the Constitution intend to provide that the question of the approval or veto of a measure of that kind should belong to a disinterested President? Was not the officer who was elected, whose certificate was made out, who knew he was to be sworn in in twelve hours—was not he within the whole intent of this clause of the Constitution the President elected? When you come to the language of the Constitution providing that the salary of the President shall not be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, I ask gentlemen here, acting upon that conscience which weighs with them, I know, as much as it does with me, whether the President who signed this act had not been elected when he signed it, and whether it was not an increase for the period and during the period for which he had been elected, both elections having taken place before the signature to the act?

It is this point, and this point only, on which I wish to go upon record; and for that reason I have spoken. It is the first time in the history of this Government that this clause of the Constitution has received a practical construction by an act of Congress. This is the first time I have had an opportunity to vote upon it; and for the reasons I have stated, that it was an act signed by the President after he had been elected to that office, and made an increase of salary during the period for which he had been elected, and that it was an act affecting his own interest, against the evident purpose of the Constitution, I feel compelled to vote on the only occasion giving me the opportunity for keeping the salary where the Constitution and the former law left it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move to amend by striking out the last word. A single remark in relation to what has just fallen from the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] The gentleman bases his constitutional argument not upon what the Constitution says, but upon what in his judgment it intended to say, arguing that the mischief is as great by permitting legislation increasing the salary in the present form as if it came within the words of the Constitution.

Mr. KASSON. Does it not come within the words of the Constitution?

Mr. HALE, of New York. It plainly does not come within the words, for the reason that the act raising the President's salary was not during the period for which the President had been elected. That period commenced on the 4th of March. But by way of illustration of the inconsequential character of the argument of the gentleman, I beg to refer to section 6, relating to members of Congress. There is a provision that—

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

The intent of this, it might be argued, was to prevent Congress from creating offices or increasing emoluments of office to be enjoyed by its members; yet it has been settled by practice as old as the Government itself that Congress may, on the 3d day of March, create any number of offices, and on the next day, the 4th day of March, every man who was a member of the Congress just terminated is eligible to fill those offices. Such is the practice, and the rule is precisely the same in the construction of the clause relating to the President. The argument as to the mischief can only be sustained by showing that the act is prohibited by the terms of the Constitution. It is no more prohibited in the case of the President than it is prohibited in the case of members of Congress in relation to offices created by them, and to which they may enter immediately upon the expiration of their term.

Mr. POLAND. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am exceedingly astonished at this constitutional question that has been raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and more astonished still at the view that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] says that, upon deliberate consideration, he has formed upon this subject. It seems to me that if anything is so perfectly plain that there can be no possible doubt in relation to it, it is that the gentleman's view is entirely unfounded and wrong.

Now, what is the period for which we elect a President? We elect a President of the United States for a period of four years. The Constitution says that his compensation shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected. Now, President Grant was elected for a period of four years, which expired in March, 1873. Did the act of March 3, 1873, increase his compensation, or profess to increase it, during the period for which he was first elected? Not at all. It provided that that increased compensation should commence on the 4th day of last March. President Grant was elected for a second period of four years succeeding the 4th day of March, 1873. Was there any act of Congress during that period of time which has increased his compensation for this second period? Gentlemen say there was. There is no possible difference, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, between the case of a President who is elected for a second period and of one who had served a term of four years and another man had been elected for the succeeding period.

I do not know the gentleman from Iowa intends to claim there would be any distinction in this case from what it would be if some other gentleman had occupied the presidential chair for the last presidential term. I understand his argument to be that this comes within the reason upon which this constitutional provision was founded, that the action of Congress might in some degree be warped by executive influence, and therefore this prohibition upon Congress of increasing or diminishing his compensation during the period of his presidential office was made.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman from Vermont will allow me, I will say I think the Constitution intended to prohibit an increase or diminution from partisan motives, and required it to be made before the election had taken place and before they knew the man who was to be President.

Mr. POLAND. If that was the intention of the framers of the Constitution they were very singularly infelicitous in using the language to express that intention. What was the period for which President Grant was elected for the present term? He was elected for a period of four years, the beginning of which was on the 4th of March, 1873. On the 3d day of March, the day before the commencement of the period for which he had been elected, this act of Congress was passed. Now, can the gentleman say by any torture of language the framers of the Constitution meant the 3d day of March was within the period for which the President was elected, when by law his term did not commence until the next day?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, my friend had better reflect over again on this subject before he comes to so positive a constitutional conclusion.

Mr. TREMAIN. It appears to me very plain, Mr. Chairman, the objection that is taken by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has no foundation either in the letter or in the spirit of the Constitution. I understand the objection to be that as soon as the election was closed the present incumbent of the presidential office is to be deemed to have been elected within the meaning of the Constitution. Now it seems, if we look back to the very first section of article 2, which contains the provision referred to, we will find a complete and systematic scheme leaving no room to doubt as to what is intended by the words "during the period for which he shall have been elected." The first section of article 2 provides that the President shall hold his office during the term of four years. If, then, the period for which he was elected commenced on the close of the election in November, what escape is there from the conclusion that the period extends over a period of four years and a half? He certainly continued in office until the 4th of March, 1873, but, according to this argument, if the period for which he had been elected had already commenced in the preceding November, instead of holding his term for four years he would hold his term for four years and a half.

Again, the Constitution requires before he can hold his office he has to take an oath in a particularly prescribed form. According to the argument of the gentleman, the President's term of office had already commenced, and he was President of the United States, although he had taken no oath of office, because that oath could only be taken and become operative when the term commenced, as prescribed by the Constitution. You will find similar language employed in the sixth section of article 1 of the Constitution, relating to the eligibility of a Senator or Representative to office where the emoluments of the office had been increased during his term.

This provision was considerably discussed at the time the nomination for the office of Chief Justice was made, or was contemplated, and the provision of that section is this:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time.

Now, we have in our minds the case of several Senators whose names were mentioned in connection with the office of Chief Justice who occupied this position. During the last senatorial term which the Senator had held he had voted to increase the pay of the Chief Justice of the United States. But the term of office he then held as Senator had expired and he had been re-elected by the Legislature of the State for a new term. He was holding office under the new term.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. He had previously been re-elected.

Mr. TREMAIN. He had already been re-elected. Now, was there anybody who doubted he was eligible to the office of Chief Justice of the United States under the provisions of this section? Did anybody suppose that his case came within this language, that he was then, his term having expired, within the prohibition of this section where the increase had been made under the circumstances to which I have referred? And yet, according to the interpretation that is claimed by the gentlemen on the other side, he would have been plainly ineligible.

The provision of the Constitution is plain. It is according to common sense. There is no sophistry and no argument that can ever throw a doubt over it, and the effect of it is that when General Grant was elected, in November, he was holding under the old term and his new term did not commence until the 4th of March. He was then, at the time of the passage of the law, in the receipt of a compensation which was neither to be increased nor diminished during that period. He was not holding office during the term for which his compensation could be increased or diminished.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.] Is that amendment withdrawn?

Mr. TREMAIN. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Strike out "$50,000" and insert "$25,000;" so that it will read: "For compensation of the President of the United States, $25,000."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 27, noes 73; no quorum voting.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair orders tellers, and appoints Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. GARFIELD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 86; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not call for the count, and I do not insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Further count not being insisted on, the amendment is declared lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For contingent expenses of the executive office, including stationery therefor, $6,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, and Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to move to strike out the paragraph which has just been read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before that is done I move, pro forma, to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making a few observations. While I dislike to bring back the discussion in regard to the appropriations for the executive office, I think an additional word may serve to set some parts of that question in a somewhat clearer light.

It has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] in regard to the charge that these appropriations are perquisites, that they are in no sense perquisites, and to that I agree. It has been said on the other side, by the other gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that they are not expenditures for the household of the President. I disagree with that. I understand that all expenditures for the White House for repairs, for refurnishing, for the china, the glass, the plate, and all expenses of that class, are paid out of these public appropriations; that the grounds are taken care of at the public expense; that the house is warmed and lighted at the public charge; in other words, what we ordinarily speak of as the expenses attending any private establishment, which a member of this House might own and occupy, are in the case of the Executive, all paid out of the public appropriations, and what is left for the President to pay out of his salary or out of his personal income are the personal expenses of himself, of his family, and of his table. Many of the servants, as has been stated here, or persons whom other people would be obliged to employ as servants, are paid out of the public purse.

Now I am not arraying these facts for the purpose of saying that our appropriations for these expenditures are too large or too small. I desire simply to have the facts appear just as they are. We appropriate $50,000 for the salary of the President. I do not say now whether that is too much or too little. I voted against the proposition to increase this salary at all its stages. Then we appropriate outside of that for a great many expenses connected with the White House, which any member of Congress is obliged to incur who occupies a house in Washington. Any gentleman living in that way in this city is obliged in the first place to hire or to buy his house. In the next place, if he buys it he has to pay taxes on it. In the next place, he has to furnish it and keep it in repair. Then he has to pay for his door-keepers and ushers, for heating it, for lighting it, &c. Now all of these expenses for the executive establishment are provided for in our appropriation bills, and I think they ought to be so paid, independent of the salary of the Executive. Yet it has been said here, and it was said when the matter was before the last Congress, that we must pay the President this large sum because he was obliged to keep up a great establishment. Now that is not true. The Secretary of State is obliged by the usage attending his office to pay five dollars out of his private purse for expenses that are in no sense private for every dollar that the President of the United States is called upon to pay in a similar way. All the receptions at the White House are at the public charge, so far as they are a charge to anybody; while the receptions of the Secretaries, of the Senators, and of the Members are at their own charge; and besides, these officials must support such establishments as they choose to maintain out of their own pockets.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. If the Secretary of State is not compensated as he ought to be, should there not be provision made for giving him adequate compensation?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am not saying whether his salary is adequate or not; I am not discussing that.

We have cut down at this session the salary of the Secretary of State, and I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] voted to reduce it from $10,000 to $8,000, and we have reduced the salaries of the other Cabinet officers. I do not believe there is in this country any divinity that doth hedge about a President, and I cannot understand why other salaries can be properly criticised while the presidential compensation is considered too sacred to be assailed. I am ready to vote a liberal salary to the President, as I am ready to vote a liberal salary to anybody who holds high official position; but if you are hunting for arguments in favor of an increase of salary growing out of the necessary expenditures attending official positions you can find ten arguments in favor of the increase of the salaries of members of this House, of members of the Senate, and of the members of the Cabinet, where you can find one for increasing the salary of the President of the United States from the old pay of $25,000 a year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to strike out the word "six" and to insert "four" in the clause providing for contingent expenses; so that it will read:

For contingent expenses of the executive office, including stationery therefor, $4,000.

That is a mistake in printing. It should have been $4,000 instead of $6,000. This matter of contingent expenses has not been left to uncertainty, so that any gentleman might believe that under that vague name there may be improper and extravagant expenditures. It is made up of items which I will give.

First, telegrams. Everybody understands with reference to that that there are constantly, every day, dispatches upon public business received by the President, received in his office by his secretaries and clerks; and there is no reason why that expense should be paid from his salary. It is a kind of expense that is allowed for from the public funds in the case of every head of a Bureau or Department.

Another item is stationery. The same is true with reference to that, and the stationery in the executive department covers stationery of an expensive character, such as is used for commissions and for all the various duties involving the use of it.

Then there is the item of furniture. From time to time a renewal of furniture is necessary, not in the rooms occupied by the President's family, not in the rooms occupied by him in his domestic and private relations, but in the rooms occupied as offices by him in doing the business of the country as Chief Magistrate. Furniture is needed in these rooms, in the shape of curtains, carpets, desks, and one thing or another of that sort.

Another item is newspapers. That item is also allowed to the other heads of Departments. There is not in all Washington the head of a Bureau, or even the head of a division or sub-division of a Bureau, in which newspapers are not allowed. Then, too, there are periodicals for the library of the Presidential Mansion. That library is from time to time added to in a small proportion, in a small ratio, and a small sum has to be paid for periodicals and books for the library. There are a number of other small items, and that is how this sum is made up. But it was agreed by the committee that the amount of this appropriation should be $4,000 and not $6,000, and my motion is to amend the bill so as to conform to that recommendation of the committee. I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will state that this amendment is made after consultation with General Babcock, who has charge of all these matters. He himself made up the figures, and the committee has carefully scrutinized and examined them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word. I discover on a more careful examination that when I was last upon the floor I made a mistake as to the amount of the contingent appropriation made by this bill in excess of that made in 1866, which I shall be very glad to correct. But it is said that there is not a material increase in the appropriation proposed by this bill over and above the appropriations for the year to which I refer. The appropriations last year for this purpose were $13,800, and $4,000 added to that would make $17,800, as against $27,804 appropriated by this bill. I believe I have got the figures correctly. That is to say, while we increase the presidential salary to $50,000, we at the same time increase the contingent appropriations in various forms to some $27,800, even if the appropriation in this item is put at $4,000 instead of $6,000 as it stands in the bill. While it is evidently the purpose of this House that the salary of the President shall stand as it is, I insist that the appropriations which enter into the presidential salary not indirectly, but directly, shall be taken into account in connection with the increase of the presidential salary.

I see no reason why this $4,000 should be appropriated. As for the stationery used in the office of the President, that is but a small item, and I have no objection to an appropriation for that purpose. But I do object to any appropriation for any other purpose in this connection. Therefore I adhere to my motion to strike out this entire paragraph.

The first question was upon the motion of Mr. HALE, of Maine, to strike out $6,000 and insert $4,000; which was agreed to.

The next question was upon the motion of Mr. HOLMAN to strike out the paragraph as amended; and being taken, it was not agreed to—ayes 19, noes not counted.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Department of State:

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $8,000; two Assistant Secretaries of State, at $3,500 each; for chief clerk, $2,500; ten clerks of class four, additional compensation to one clerk of class four as disbursing clerk; nine clerks of class three; three clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; one messenger; one assistant messenger; nine laborers, and four watchmen; in all, $74,820.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out $3,500 and inserting $6,000 as the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries of State. The amendment which I propose is to restore the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries of State to the sum at which they were placed by the act of last session. The sum paid to these two officers has been totally out of proportion to the sum paid to other Assistant Secretaries, considering the responsible character of their duties and the character of the men who should be selected to fill those offices.

We have there now one gentleman who has been for forty years in the service of the Government; without whom it seems hardly possible that the State Department could be carried on; who has the whole treasures of diplomatic history at his command. We have another gentleman there who was eminent in his profession as a lawyer; who has edited most excellently the decisions of the courts relating to the diplomatic service and the treaties of the United States; who was our agent at the Geneva arbitration, and prepared that masterly presentation of the American case. We have there gentlemen whose services, faithfully and laboriously rendered, are worth a great deal more than the compensation which has long been fixed as their salaries. Last winter we placed their salaries at the proper sum. Because that general act was swept away by the popular indignation, for the reason that it was understood to have been procured by bribery, I do not believe that this House or the American people wish to do any particular act of shabbiness that can be shown to be such. In comparison with the pay of our door-keepers and our clerks we do not pay these Assistant Secretaries anything like a fair compensation for their services, rendered throughout the year, and of such a responsible and valuable character.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman tell us how he voted on the proposition to reduce the salaries of these same officers some weeks ago?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have voted on no such proposition. I voted in favor of the bill repealing the increase of salaries, in which these were included, supposing that the principal object to be reached was in regard to the salaries of members of Congress, and that at the proper time we would do justice to these public servants of the Government. I voted steadily against every proposition to include anything but the salaries of members of Congress in that act. I thought it would have been more consonant with the dignity of the House if we had refused to put into the repealing act anything relating to the compensation of subordinate officers of the Government. I thought that the members of this House, when they dealt with their own salaries, were acting upon honor; that they stood in the position of those to whom the public gave the purse and said "Take what you think fit out of it;" that the question of proper compensation of subordinate officers was one with which the House should have dealt separately and upon their individual merits.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from Massachusetts said——

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman——

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] desires to ask me a question.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman said that the salary increase he understood was carried by bribery.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I said that the country so understood it.

Mr. DUNNELL. By bribery; that was the word.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes, sir; that was the precise word. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. DUNNELL. I only wanted to know if I correctly understood the gentleman

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I said that the country supposed that that act was carried by giving to outgoing members additional compensation to induce them to vote for it, when otherwise they would not have done so.

Mr. DUNNELL. If that be true, will the gentleman say that it was an act of bribery?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I said that it was considered by the country as an act of bribery.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does not the gentleman think it would be wiser, as a piece of practical legislation, instead of attempting to amend this bill in the manner he has indicated, to frame a general bill which will cover the salaries of all these several departmental officers, and adjust them upon some common principle of fairness which will apply to them all?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That would have been very desirable. But the session is passing on, and that business has not been attended to. It seems to me that great injustice has been done to these meritorious officers; and I dare say that there are many others in the same category. I certainly should be very glad to have this subject of salaries considered fairly and equitably.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend the amendment by striking out $6,000 and inserting $5,500. I will state my reasons for offering this amendment. A bill has been prepared and agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Civil Service Reform, allowing to all the Assistant Secretaries in the various Departments a salary of $5,500. The action of the committee was taken upon a bill referred to us by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] which I think fixed the salaries at $6,000; but in going through the list of salaries we fixed that of the Assistant Secretary of State, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and the Assistant Secretary of the Interior all at $5,500, as corresponding with the salaries of the Secretaries themselves, $8,000.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has referred to a bill introduced by me.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill was introduced and referred by the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state that when I introduced that bill I said that I did so at the request of my colleague from the Essex district, [Mr. BUTLER,] without any regard to the merits of the bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. That did not appear upon the indorsement of the bill, and I was not in the House when it was introduced. I took the bill as I found it. If it was introduced at the instance of the gentleman's colleague, I accept the explanation.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me further in my five minutes. The committee were satisfied that these Assistant Secretaries ought to have their salaries raised; but when the salary was fixed at $6,000, that of the Secretaries themselves was fixed at $10,000; and the question in the committee was whether we should fix the salary of the Assistant Secretaries at $5,000 or $5,500. The committee have unanimously agreed upon a bill fixing $5,500 as the salary; and only the expiration of the morning hour prevented us from reporting that bill on last Tuesday. It will be reported early next week, and, with the permission of the House, referred to the Committee of the Whole, where I hope it will receive prompt consideration, so that justice may be done to these men; for as chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform I am not going to take the ground that because we have reduced our own salaries (compelled as we thought we were by public sentiment) we ought to cut down the salaries of these Assistant Secretaries below what we pay at home to the teller or cashier of a bank. I certainly think these salaries ought to be raised.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. DAWES. I wish to occupy but a moment. Of course the gentleman from Connecticut was not aware of what I have stated.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was not.

Mr. DAWES. While I am not going to be drawn into this debate about salaries, I want to put on record for the last time the fact that several months ago I introduced half a dozen bills at the request of my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] without knowing their contents; and every single bill that I thus introduced in entire unconsciousness of its provisions I have been called to account for in one way or another. I do not know whether my colleague from the Essex district had any design on me in that operation, but it is just like him. I desire to state here that I hold myself absolved from any responsibility for this bill increasing the salaries of these Assistant Secretaries and for the various other bills that I presented for my colleague. One of them proposed to extend a patent, though I never was in favor of extending any patent. During the eighteen years I have been in this House I have opposed every proposition for the extension of a patent; yet my colleague got me to introduce a bill to extend a patent. Another of those bills was to shut up a port in his district where he had some trouble with the collector; and I had all the inhabitants of the town down on me for that. Another of the bills was for the relief of somebody—a private bill; and the Committee on Claims insisted that I should take care of my bill before that committee. I only speak of these as some of my trials for putting so much confidence in some of my colleagues.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say only a single word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I did not know that this bill was one of the batch of bills which he presented for his colleague, or out of kindness to my friend I might not have alluded to it. The indorsement of the bill did not show that he presented it for his colleague; and I supposed that every gentleman on this floor when he introduced a public bill knew what he was doing. My friend has been here so long that, though in recognition of the right of petition he may present any petition that his constituents send to him, I did not suppose that in his simplicity he would allow himself to be made a tool of to introduce a bill and send it with the indorsement of his honored name, backed by nearly twenty years' service on this floor, to our humble Committee on Civil Service Reform, lending the weight of his name in carrying that bill into effect. However, I think we should have taken the same action if his name had not been on the bill.

I cheerfully give him the benefit of his correction to-day. He has said that he is in favor of putting these salaries where they ought to be.

Mr. DAWES. We are all the victims sometimes of misplaced confidence.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts who offered the amendment that last year, in the general increase of salaries, there were included Assistant Secretaries and heads of Departments in one group and were passed in that way. Whatever we do in regard to the Assistant Secretaries of State manifestly ought to be done for the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and for the First, Second and Third Assistant Postmasters-General and for other corresponding offices, and I hope, therefore, whatever is to be done will be done in a group so that all will be acted on together. But as we have so recently cut down these salaries, I hope we will not begin by insisting upon getting one in, for if we get in one it means all the others will follow. I admit, however, with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that $3,500 a year is an entirely inadequate salary for a man holding the position of an Assistant Secretary of State; but I do not believe we ought now, in the immediate face of what we have just adopted, to enter upon this before we are ready to go more elaborately into it and provide a general salary bill. Do not let us do by piecemeal on this bill what we ought to do all together when we do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the amendment is withdrawn I will renew it, and I wish to call the attention of the House while the subject of salaries is up to this fact: I find the appropriation eight years ago for the same purposes of this paragraph and the following one was $72,020. The appropriation for these salaries eight years ago for this same State Department was $72,020. The appropriation made here for a like purpose has run up to $89,220, being an increase of $17,220 in eight years.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] that while most of us understood the purpose of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, yet we did not believe that committee would develop its character in the form in which it now seems to display itself during the present session of Congress.

I trust whatever it is going to do it will do during the present session of Congress, and that the increase of salaries contemplated by that Committee on Reform in the Civil Service will be brought forward at once, so the judgment of the people may be pronounced upon the proposition.

Here is a Department where in eight years there has been an increase of $17,220, and we are told the salaries are too low. We are told by a committee which was supposed to be in the direction of reform—a Committee on Civil Service Reform—that these salaries are beggarly salaries, unworthy of a Government like ours, and that they must be increased. Now, sir, I trust the gentleman from Connecticut, if he proposes this work of increasing the salaries after the public voice has demanded their reduction, will not allow his bill to go over until after the people have pronounced their judgment upon the action of this Congress. The country is demanding two things with unequivocal voice, low salaries, such as befit a plain and economical administration of Government, and a heavy reduction of the expenditures of the Government. The people cry out for low salaries and low taxation, and the country will take nothing else. So I hope we will not have simply the intimation that certain salaries, deemed sufficient during the long years of the war and of inflation of our currency, shall be increased, but that the gentleman will bring forward his bill and let us see whether, if this Congress thinks proper to give it vitality by their votes, the country will sustain an extravagance which they have in the most signal manner so recently denounced.

This same evil occurred before on this very same bill. It commenced with raising the salary of our own clerks, and it is an evil of which the people of the country have justly complained. If this Congress proposes to regard public sentiment at all, it will emphatically say that there shall not be a dollar of increase of salary allowed during the present session of Congress.

Mr. RICE. I propose to say at this point that the people of the United States expect and are willing to pay fair salaries for duties faithfully performed. That is the only question they ask, and that is what they propose to do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will yield to me two minutes of his five. I do not wish to prolong this debate, but merely to say in reply to my friend from Indiana that I consider it is good civil-service reform to pay the Assistant Secretary of State a salary sufficient to keep a good man there; I consider that as good civil-service reform as any other branch of the subject. Neither he nor anybody else will frighten me or that committee from putting the salary of any man in a responsible position, when the subject-matter is referred to our committee, so far at least as I am concerned, at such a sum as we think he ought to have.

Now, in the bill which was reported by our committee and went to the Committee of the Whole yesterday, we have endeavored to reorganize the Treasury Department. We found the salary of every Auditor $3,000, the same as it was fixed in the days of James Madison and James Monroe, more than fifty years ago, and we raised them all to $4,000, because we thought their positions entitled them to that salary. And we say that men who are fit to discharge the responsible duties of Assistant Secretaries of State or Auditors should have greater salaries than were considered sufficient fifty years ago.

I care not that we have cut down our own salaries. If we find the salary of any office too low for retaining the services of a good man in it let us pay him an adequate salary and not be too niggardly. Gentlemen have already spoken of the increased public business during the last few years. Every one knows that there is vastly more to do in the Government to-day than there was twenty-five, or thirty, or forty years ago. And when the gentleman from Indiana talks about appealing to the people, and says they will not consent to official salaries being raised, I beg to tell him once for all that the people have more sense than gentlemen here sometimes give them credit for, and that they will not be blinded by statements of that sort on this floor.

Mr. SENER. I move as an amendment to the amendment, to make the sum "$5,000." I agree that this House and the country are willing to pay an adequate compensation to these public officers; but it occurs to me that an increase of 40 per cent., to wit, an increase from $3,500 to $5,000 will answer all the reasonable requirements of these servants of ours for the next fiscal year, looking to the prostrate condition of the business of the country.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am opposed to that amendment, because it still rates the salary too high. I am not here on this occasion to vote to increase any salary unless there be some special urgency on account of which it should be increased.

I agree, however, with some things that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] has said. I agree with him that the pay of some of the officers of the Government, everything considered, is too low. But I think this is a most unfortunate time to talk about increasing it.

But what I wish to call the attention of the House to particularly is the great disparity, the astounding disparity, which exists between the pay of the President of the United States and the heads of the Departments and their principal assistants and Bureau officers. It is not for me to attempt to correct this discrepancy or to bring about a different condition of things, not being in the confidence of the Administration and not being in a position to obtain a majority in this House to sustain me in any proposition of this sort. But I desire to emphasize here, what I have said elsewhere and what I think ought to be kept constantly in view when we are considering the question of salaries, that we have raised the salary of the President of the United States to $50,000, furnished him an executive office and a residence and nearly all the expenses to which he is subjected, except those of his table and of perhaps a few family servants. Yet, at the same time, we are paying $8,000 to the members of the Cabinet, who are required to furnish their own houses, and to bear all the expenses to which their residence in this city subjects them in the discharge of their duties. And we pay them nothing whatever beyond their salaries. Now I have thought common justice, common consistency, everything that properly appeals to the minds of fair-minded and practical legislators, would suggest that we ought either to reducce in some way, if not directly, yet possibly indirectly, the pay of the President of the United States, or else we ought to give these Department and Bureau officers more compensation. There is gross injustice somewhere. Either the President's salary is an injustice to the people, or else what we pay to the other executive officers next to him is an injustice to them. I appeal to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform—I appeal to him, as a just man, to say whether this great discrepancy is not a reproach to us as a legislative body?

Mr. KELLOGG. I beg to say to the gentleman from Indiana that we have not had the President's salary before us in the Committee on Civil Service Reform by any reference whatever. We did not suppose that we had the subject before us.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish only to say further that if we cannot reduce the President's salary during the present term, let us reduce it prospectively. Let us do something to show that we recognize this great disparity which exists.

Mr. KELLOGG. And let me say further in regard to what is proposed by the Committee on Civil Service Reform, that while we have proposed to raise some salaries we make a permanent reduction of almost $400,000 by the bill from the expenses of the Treasury Department of last year.

Mr. NIBLACK. Allow me one word further. I complain more of this disposition to increase officers and multiply offices than I do of what we pay them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say in a word that I hope before this Congress adjourns in its present session a commission will be appointed, or a joint committee of the two Houses, to sit during the recess and report a salary bill reorganizing and recasting the civil-service salaries of the United States.

Mr. SENER. That is but a hope of the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. Such a thing is very important, but we cannot hope to do it piecemeal in an appropriation bill like this. I call for a vote.

The question was taken upon Mr. SENER's amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to—ayes 37, noes not counted.

The question recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. KELLOGG; and being taken, the amendment was not agreed to—ayes 45, noes not counted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer an amendment to come in on line 292, to strike out the words "additional compensation to one clerk of class 4, or disbursing clerk."

That has been found to be unnecessary, because in the reorganization of the Department a disbursing clerk is already provided for elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SENER. I move to amend in lines 291 and 292 by striking out "$2,500" and inserting "$3,000;" so that it will read:

For chief clerk, $3,000.

My object is this: It will be found by referring to lines 328, 329, 330, and 331, that the chief clerk of the Treasury Department and the chief clerks of the several divisions in that Department receive an annual compensation of $3,000 each. The State Department, from the organization of the Government, has been recognized as the first Department in point of importance in this Government, and the officer who occupied the position of chief clerk prior to the present incumbent was the lamented Mr. Chew, with whom I was well acquainted. He was a citizen of my town, and was forty years in the service of the State Department, serving with sixteen Secretaries of State, under twelve Presidents, and dying as he had lived, a most honest, faithful, and capable public servant, enjoying under all administrations the confidence of his superiors and the respect and esteem of all with whom he was brought into intercourse. This faithful chief clerk, after forty years of public service, was stinted with the poor pittance of $2,500 as his annual compensation—a sum much less than he would have received as the chief clerk of any first-class private business enterprise in the country.

This late faithful public servant assured me during his life-time that the duties of this position of chief clerk required him to be present in the office generally from eight o'clock in the morning until four in the evening, and during the sessions of Congress almost continuously at night. I do not know who his successor is except by name; but this I know, that whoever is chief clerk of the State Department, having in charge the most important matters connected with our home affairs, and the most important of all our foreign relations, ought to be a man of high character and ability; and I have every confidence that this gentleman, appointed by the present Secretary of State, is such a man; for however much there may be intimations and insinuations in the public prints and otherwise against the integrity of other Departments of this Government—and most, if not all, of these I believe to be not well founded—there is no such insinuation or intimation against this Department or the honored Secretary who presides over it. This is the only Department in this Government which, as I understand it, is self-sustaining. The excess of consular fees that are paid in yearly really makes the State Department self-sustaining.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why, the Treasury Department is more than self-sustaining.

Mr. SENER. How so?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has $250,000,000 of revenue a year.

Mr. SENER. How does it receive that? From taxes, direct and indirect, drawn from the people through all the Departments of the Government; while the excess of fees received through the consuls and consular agencies are really drawn from abroad.

I say, therefore, that the House ought to ask itself this question: Is this a proper compensation for the chief clerk of the State Department? And it ought to weigh that question with this other one: Is not the State Department one of equal dignity and importance with the Treasury Department? If we are prepared to give, as we have voted year after year, $3,000 to the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, upon what principle or upon what reasoning will this House tie itself down to an appropriation of $2,500 to the chief clerk of the State Department? There ought to be this principle guiding and governing individual action, as well as State action or national legislative action, to wit, to pay a public servant an adequate compensation to keep him from stealing and starving. The cry through this land to-day is, that our public servants are unfaithful and not trustworthy. I say, pay them adequate compensation. Members of Congress complain here that $5,000 is an inadequate compensation for their services a part of each year. Surely, any man who has character enough and integrity enough to be chief clerk of the Department of State of a great Government of forty millions of people, stretching from ocean to ocean, and having its representatives in every clime throughout the civilized world, ought to receive a salary equal in importance to the duties he is called upon to perform, and equal to the salary of the chief clerks of any other Department of the Government.

I have said this much, Mr. Chairman, out of regard to a just economy, and because I believe this officer will not be adequately paid by the compensation which the Committee on Appropriations recommend; and therefore I trust my amendment will prevail.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now let us have a vote.

The question was taken on Mr. SENER's amendment; and it was not agreed to, ayes 34, noes not counted.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will let us work awhile longer; we are just running now.

Mr. COX. I must insist on my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the committee to stand by the Committee on Appropriations, and not rise upon everybody's motion.

The question was taken on Mr. COX's motion; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For publishing the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress in pamphlet form and in newspapers, $60,000: Provided, That after the 4th day of March, 1875, the publication of the laws in newspapers shall cease.

Mr. PURMAN. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out the proviso. While this proviso is already the law, having been enacted in the appropriation bill of 1872, I beg to take this occasion for an expression of my sentiments upon some other not irrelevant questions.

This proviso repeals a law enacted by the forefathers of the Government, for the publication of United States laws in several designated newspapers in each State, for the purpose of presenting them to the public for their guidance as quickly as possible after their passage by Congress. What the purpose of the forefathers was in the first inauguration of this system of publication which this proviso seeks to repeal, I can only conjecture. It was either to give the earliest possible notification of the enactment of a law to the people, that every public and private interest affected might receive the immediate safeguard of such law, or else the purpose was to confer subsidies to aid the establishment of newspapers throughout the then infant country. There was wisdom and statesmanship in either or both of these purposes.

I protest against this repeal of $60,000, for every party and administration should give all possible lawful support and subsidy to its own newspapers. Of course I speak for encouragement to the republican press of the country, and especially in the South.

If the publication of the laws in newspapers is a benefit to the people, it may be in the same connection an aid or subsidy to such papers, and any party should discriminate in favor of its own press; for the power and continued success of any political party lie in the strength, ability, and reliability of its own partisan newspapers. Encourage, then, these powerful agencies which spread intelligence and enlightenment throughout the country as the orb of day spreads the light and sunshine over the earth. Our press needs this encouragement in the South. We struggle against every description of prejudice and opposition, and as the press is our vanguard, carrying enlightenment and persuasion on its banners, it must be supported in one form or another, or our political supremacy as a party will not, cannot be lasting.

I admire a thoroughly republican or democratic paper; but for any class of journals styling itself "independent in politics and religion" I ask for no encouragement, for they are neither "fish, fowl, nor flesh." There is no place in the universe where a republican newspaper is so urgently needed as in the city of Savannah; and yet there are not sufficient republican readers there to support such an establishment. Because the children of a State cannot support a system of public education is no good reason why they should not receive an education.

Where the gospel is most needed it is generally the least supported.

One word more; and, with the indulgence of the committee, I will take this opportunity to express my protest against the repeal of the franking privilege. I characterize the stopping of the free distribution of public documents, seeds, and the free exchange of newspapers, as an act of glaring injustice to the people. I am aware that Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and your large cities feel no concern whatever in our Agricultural Reports, and in the various garden and flower-seeds which our agricultural constituents so highly prize, but the bounties of this Government are first due to those who build and feed cities rather than those who inhabit them.

I have supplied large quantities of various valuable and rare seeds to my constituents, and without waiting for their application, believing that it is my duty, as it certainly is my pleasure, to aid our people in Florida to build up their waste places, to introduce and stimulate new productions and open new industries, to help to cover up the unsightly devastations of the war with the luxuriance of a new growth that may promise more than their former prosperity, and to do all in my humble power to make their new homes blossom as the rose. Yes; among the more substantial I send also flower-seeds, that the rose from Washington City may bloom in that sunny clime, as the beautiful emblem of the peace and love which animate the sentiment and care of this paternal Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PURMAN] to withdraw his amendment, and I will renew it.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I will move to strike out the last word. When the gentleman from Florida was recognized by the Chair I had in my hand an amendment to strike out the proviso of this paragraph. I think it is very easy to show that that amendment ought to be made. I do not advocate the continuance of this provision for publishing the laws in the newspapers because it may be a subsidy. I do not ask for it at all because it is an aid to newspapers in any section of the country or because they need that aid. But I look upon it as necessary for a rapid, immediate, and early dissemination among the people of a knowledge of the laws that have been passed by Congress.

If we refuse this provision for such publication there will be no means for the people to become acquainted with the laws passed here until weeks and months after Congress has adjourned, until those laws have been published in pamphlet form; and the pamphlet edition of the laws, as is well known, never reaches the people. I insist that there should be published everywhere throughout the Republic, in every State of the Union, immediately after its passage, every important law, in order that the people may know of it and may know how to regulate themselves in reference to it. I insist that the small amount of money thus expended in the publication of the laws comes back to the people in a thousand different ways and in a thousandfold.

I have no sympathy with what seems to be the idea of keeping from the people this intelligence. I have always voted steadily in favor of the dissemination of the intelligence that comes from the capital of the country. I hold that the public documents should be printed and sent out to the people; that the laws should be made known to the people immediately upon their passage. I think an appropriation for the purpose of giving this information to the people is an appropriation of the highest importance. I hope this provision about which we had a struggle a year ago will be stricken from this bill.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Does not the proviso in this paragraph already exist as a law?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is the law now.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Then the gentleman will not reach his desired object by striking out this proviso. I agree with the gentleman perfectly in what he seeks to attain; but striking out this proviso will leave the law standing upon the subject.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Chairman, if I correctly understand the law as it is, the amendment of the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. PURMAN,] if adopted, will be fruitless; it would not accomplish the object at which he aims. But if it would accomplish that object, to wit, the re-enactment of the law requiring the acts of Congress to be published in two newspapers in each State, that fact would be the very best reason why the House should not adopt it. An appropriation was made in 1866 for this publication for the purpose, I believe, of supporting republican journals in the Southern States. It is safe to say that a journal that cannot live without Government aid is not a good advertising medium and deserves to die. If it meets a public want the people will support it; if it does not and the people do not read it, it is difficult to understand why the country should be taxed to pay it for publishing what no one sees or reads.

Mr. SENER. The law applies to all the States.

Mr. SPEER. Certainly.

Mr. PURMAN. According to the gentleman's argument, because a minister of the gospel cannot live from the "honest support" of the heathens, therefore we should not send a missionary among them.

Mr. SPEER. If the gentleman's remark has any pertinency it is that the republicans in the Southern States are "heathen," and that the people of the whole country should pay the expense of enlightening them.

Mr. PURMAN. Not at all.

Mr. SPEER. If they cannot read, I do not see what benefit they will derive from the publication of the laws.

Mr. MOREY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] allow me a single moment?

Mr. SPEER. I cannot refuse, although I have but five minutes.

Mr. MOREY. I wish to say that the law authorizing the publication of acts of Congress is a law dating back to the foundation of this Government, and was not enacted for the purpose of publishing laws in southern newspapers or for the benefit of republican journals.

Mr. SPEER. Be that as it may, it is well known that all through the South the laws have been published in papers that had little circulation and that were kept alive by this subsidy. I would approve of any fair means by which Congress could place before the people, not before a fragment of one party, what is done here.

But what is the practical operation of this law? I take my own State—Pennsylvania—with a population of nearly four millions, as an illustration. Under the law the Clerk of this House designates two papers in each State in which the laws shall be published. In Pennsylvania it happened that he designated, at the request of the Senators from that State I have no doubt, a paper published in my own town, the home of one of the Senators, and a paper in a county adjoining the county in which the other Senator resides. The papers are the Huntingdon Journal and the Lebanon Courier.

Mr. SENER. I make the point of order that it is not proper in debate in the House to allude to members of the other branch of Congress.

Mr. SPEER. What is the ruling of the Chair on that point?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] will proceed.

Mr. SPEER. My friend from Virginia is entirely too sensitive. I am not alluding to the action of the Senate, but to the practical operation of a law administered under the direction of Senators. The gentleman should have observed the distinction, and then I would have been spared the interruption caused by his point of order.

To return: these two papers selected in my own State are county journals, with a united circulation perhaps of less than three thousand. I take it that they are neither better nor worse than the papers selected in the other States. They are selected not on account of their circulation, not because they are the best avenues of information, but often because they are weak and sickly and it is the interest of the Member or Senator to continue their publication. He seeks under the cover of a public law to support a personal organ. Perhaps not more than one in a thousand of the people of Pennsylvania has ever seen either of the papers in which the laws are there published. The act of last Congress provided that this publication should cease in 1875; and will this House now say that this subsidy, as the gentleman from Florida properly terms it, shall be longer continued? If it be necessary in the judgment of the majority here to aid republican newspapers, let a direct appropriation be made to the papers by name, and then the country will know what we are doing, and our action will have the merit of directness and courage at least. But let us not under the pretext of communicating intelligence to the people appropriate the public money to the support of one hundred political papers of local circulation almost unknown beyond the limits of the county where published.

In the last Congress I sought by a resolution which was adopted in this House to get from the Secretary of State a correct statement in detail of the amounts paid to each of these newspapers. I failed in the object of that resolution. The Secretary of State answered the House that he was not then able to say how much it had cost. But in the Blue Book for 1873 we have the cost to the Government of this publication. I find by the Blue Book, which I hold in my hand, that there was paid to the Courier, published at Lebanon, in the county of my colleague, [Mr. KILLINGER,] the sum of $776; and to the Journal, published in my own county, the same amount.

Mr. HEREFORD. For one session?

Mr. SPEER. Yes, for the second session of the last Congress, and each paper received $424 for publishing the laws of the third session, making $1,200 to each for the two sessions. I have not the amount paid to them for the first session. It cost the Government upward of $90,000 for the publication of the laws of the second and the third session of the Forty-second Congress. Shall this abuse be continued? I am surprised that any gentleman should attempt either by direct or indirect means to continue it. I think the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress did a service to the country in reporting the provision for the discontinuance of this publication, and I trust they will have the support of the House in their opposition to the repeal of the existing law.

Mr. O'BRIEN obtained the floor, and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. PURMAN.]

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. Chairman, in the five-minute allotment of time before I could not make all the statements which pressed themselves on my attention, and I am profoundly grateful to the gentleman from Maryland for this courtesy.

It is not my desire to reflect in any manner upon those who advocated the repeal of the franking privilege as a measure of reform, and I certainly take pleasure in expressing my admiration of the present Postmaster-General, Mr. Creswell, who had the intellect and persistency to achieve so grand a result for the benefit of his own Department; but while the Department won a gigantic victory, the people lost the enjoyment of one of their dearest rights or privileges, namely, to receive without price, and in comparative abundance, public documents, and seeds, cuttings, and plants of many descriptions. The remedy rests in this Congress, as I will intimate before my five minutes expire.

I can well understand why the Postmaster-General labored and finally achieved the abolition of the free distribution of all mail matter. It was to increase the revenue of his vast Department, to decrease its annual deficiencies which must always be supplied by appropriations out of the general Treasury.

To abolish the franking privilege, it was satisfactorily estimated that the sum of $2,543,327 would be obtained as additional revenue to the Department; and, to substantiate this estimate, the sale of official postage-stamps alone to the different Departments of the Government in Washington City during the first quarter, from July 1 to September 30 of last year, amounted to $896,213.70.

With the constant extension of the postal facilities throughout the country the increase of expenditures kept pace, and as a wise and able head of this branch of the Government—and no abler Postmaster-General has filled this office since its first inauguration by Benjamin Franklin—he sought out new avenues in which to achieve reform and increase the public revenues. I feel constrained to commend the Postmaster-General for his herculean triumphs in the interests of his own Department; but who can commend this Congress for its repeated refusals to devise some other manner by and through which the people shall enjoy their ancient privilege?

I find that each member has a certain number of public books, reports, &c., allotted to him for distribution among his constituents.

Among the list of books I find Smithsonian Reports, a valuable scientific document; Mineral Resources, Coast Surveys, and Educational Reports, works of rare merit and most valuable information for every intelligent citizen; Finance Reports, Reports of the Secretaries of State and of War, Reports of the Postmaster-General and of the Attorney-General; Reports of New England Sea Fisheries and Agricultural Reports, documents in which every enterprising man cannot help but feel a deep interest; Reports on Darien Ship-canal, pamphlet copies of laws of the United States, Directories of Congress, and other valuable works and reports which I cannot enumerate here. The people do feel an interest in these publications, and if they were not published for the benefit of those who contributed the money by taxation for their publication, for whom then were these documents prepared and printed?

I am officially informed that to pay the postage on documents for the Forty-second Congress would require the amount of $1,785.14, to say nothing about the postage on seeds, plants, &c.

I know that my constituents do not ask me to put my hands into my own pocket and pay out of our inadequate salary this amount of postage on the public documents which by ancient right and custom belong to them; but they do ask that Congress shall pass some appropriation and provide for its expenditure under some system that will continue to them, freely and without price, this time-honored source of knowledge, satisfaction, and real benefit. This is the remedy I would propose. They do demand economy, but in the right direction. It is not true economy in a family to curtail the expenses in the education of the children, or in the quantity or quality of the food, or in the texture and sufficiency of raiment. Cut down the luxuries, the superfluities, but not the necessities.

It was not wise or even reasonable economy in the Forty-second Congress to appropriate $6,650,000 for only five public buildings in a few large cities, and yet consider the free distribution of public documents too expensive for this great Government. It was a spurious, mocking economy for that same Congress to appropriate $1,225,000 as mail steamship subsidies, and at the same time consider it too expensive to continue the free distribution of a few important varieties of garden seeds among the farmers and poor people of this great country.

A few days ago the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture reported a resolution, which was unanimously agreed to by that committee, providing for the free distribution of all seeds, plants, &c., by the Agricultural Department; yet what was the fate of this movement on the part of the committee in the right direction? It was defeated by the vote of this House, and yet I predict that in the infatuation of this unwise economy this House will, before the adjournment of this session, vote millions of dollars for magnificent structures of granite in cities; yes, a million alone for the post-office building in New York City, which will cost not less than $8,000,000 when completed. Magnificent expenditures of money in the cities, while the agricultural people of the country are asking in vain for a few seeds, is the policy of this modern economical statesmanship. This strange and unnatural policy cannot last more than a short season. The people do not approve it. It is false in its teachings—teaches that the country is retrograding instead of progressing; that our prosperity is less than in the days of our fathers; that this Government is poorer than it was fifty years ago.

The people cannot be hoodwinked; they will see through all sorts of demagogism, whether practiced in high or low places, and a reaction will set in as surely as the eternal law that makes all extremes to rebound.

I beg leave of the committee to withdraw the amendment, as it is well understood that it can be of no avail in this connection, as it cannot change or affect the existing law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this proposition to withhold the printing of the publishing of the laws from the newspapers in the country is familiar to us. It is an old effort made here every session of Congress in the appropriation bill to prevent the papers of the country from publishing the laws. We have succeeded so far in defeating the committee in that proposition, and I trust we will again.

Now it is no argument to me that the laws ought not to be printed in the newspapers because the people of the district represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania do not read them. If his people have no taste for reading newspapers and learning the laws of the country, that is no argument to the American Congress that the laws ought not to be published for the benefit of the constituency who do read them. It is no argument to me against the publication that the republican newspapers of the country publish these laws. Whenever the democracy comes into power (which I hope to God they never will) they will give the printing to their papers, if we are to judge of the future by the past. When in power the democratic party always gave this printing to their democratic newspapers, and because the republicans do not give them to the democratic papers, and democrats do not or cannot read them, that is no argument why we should not publish the laws.

Something has been said about a crusade. I do not know whether my friend from Florida alludes to the whisky crusade or not; that is the most popular crusade now I believe that is extant; but it is a crusade against the public and against the rural districts not to publish those laws in the newspapers. The laws that are enacted here are not published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and they are not published in pamphlet form or in book form until three or four months after Congress has risen. And where are we to get them meanwhile? Suppose a lawyer wants them, how is he to get them? If he lived in Pennsylvania and wanted a copy of the laws, I would write to the editor of the county newspaper in the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] and direct him to send me a paper. No doubt the gentleman's own people do not want them. I would expect that there would be a surplus in that locality.

The Committee on Appropriations is a liberal committee, and I always like to follow their lead heartily. But every time this appropriation is brought forward, this old ghost is raised and it is urged that you should take away this printing from the little country newspapers.

I beg to tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] that this law was not enacted for the benefit of the Southern States. This was a law before he or I was born, that the laws of the country should be published in this way. There can be no good objection to it. But I suppose that the Committee on Appropriations desire to cut down the expenditures, and our democratic friends wish that the republican newspapers shall not have the benefit of this. They think that if this appropriation is kept from them they cannot exist.

Mr. GARFIELD. This appropriation has elicited a good deal of wit whenever it has come before the House, for three sessions at least. It was not necessary to put it in this bill except as a matter of fair dealing, that the House might be informed that this is the law and that this is the last time the appropriation will appear here if the House will stand by the Committee on Appropriations. The plain fact is that Congress two winters ago undertook to cut off by the roots a manifest, undefended, and indefensible abuse.

Now, no man can say that this publication of the laws in the newspapers has disseminated the laws among the people. If it did really give the laws to the people that would be an argument that could not be answered. What does this law do? It selects two newspapers—and no daily in the country will publish them; no daily can afford it at the rate we pay—selects two newspapers in a State; two in the State of Pennsylvania; two in Ohio, &c. And what are they? They are papers whose circulation does not average a thousand, probably does not average five hundred; and some seventy-four newspapers in the United States with an average circulation of less than a thousand are paid $70,000 for printing these laws weeks and months after their passage.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman whether that is the fault of the law or of the Representatives who designate that class of papers?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is because none but the small country newspapers would publish them.

Mr. HEREFORD. It is the Clerk of the House who designates them under the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the Clerk, I have no doubt, does the best he can. I know a large State, as large nearly as the State of Pennsylvania, where at the present moment the laws are published in two newspapers fifty miles apart; and that is called distributing broadcast the laws of the United States. And I remind gentlemen of another fact, that two or three years ago when this thing came up here we found that away up in the State of Nevada a country editor had sent down here and gathered up from generous members of Congress a thousand of the unbound, unstitched copies of the laws. He got the job of printing the laws, and sent to each of his subscribers one of the copies he had got from members of Congress as an extra of his paper, and got the whole paid for under the cover that he had printed a title page. That was one circumstance which induced us to wipe out this abuse.

We propose to circulate more of these pamphlet copies of the laws. We can send them through the Clerk's office, as we now do. We appropriate for sending these out, and can appropriate more if necessary. But let us not, on the pretext and the pretense that we are giving the laws to the people, appropriate $70,000 to these newspapers.

My friend from Florida [Mr. PURMAN] told the House that this was a little newspaper subsidy. That was a frank statement of the case, and it is all there is of it. It is a subsidy merely to two newspapers in each State. It is one of those abuses which Congress has thought it fit should be wiped out. We could not two years ago wipe it out instantly, and we agreed that it should cease in 1875. We have got nearly to the end of it, and I hope gentlemen will consent now to its death.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. The gentleman states that no daily would take the printing of these laws. I hold in my hand the Baltimore Daily American, which has published the laws for six years. Is that an obscure newspaper?

Mr. SENER. The Richmond Daily State Journal publishes them also.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, obtained the floor.

Mr. PURMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment for a personal explanation?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will try to stop soon enough to allow the gentleman one minute out of my five. I may perhaps be able to aid some gentlemen in understanding this matter, for I have had some personal experience in regard to it. I have the pleasure of being one of the proprietors of a newspaper which—for I do not know how long, but perhaps ever since this law in relation to the publication of the laws in newspapers was in force—perhaps for seventy-five years has published these laws. So far as pecuniary profit to the newspapers is concerned the publication of the laws is worth nothing to them; it pays a little more than the cost of composition; and I do not know of any newspapers of large circulation doing a respectably profitable business that care anything about it for pecuniary profit. They like well enough to be named as the official papers and publish the laws from day to day, putting apprentices to work upon them and others at odd times; but the printing of them is considered rather a load.

There is, however, this to be said upon the subject: The pamphlet edition of the laws does not get out and into circulation for several months after Congress adjourns, and then only a few copies are scattered through a State. Now I know that time and again lawyers practicing in the United States courts have had occasion to send to the newspaper office in a hurry to get their printed copy of the laws, which was the only form in which they could get access to them.

Now if, instead of distributing this patronage among the newspapers throughout the country, the committee will provide for one newspaper printed in Washington which shall publish all the laws as soon as they are signed by the President, then all lawyers practicing in the United States courts, and all persons interested in patents and in internal improvements and in the various other matters which go to make up our legislation, would subscribe for that paper and so get an early copy of the laws. It would be better that we should have an official gazette, which should from day to day or from week to week publish the laws as soon as they are signed by the President.

Mr. DUNNELL. How much would that cost?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It would be a great deal cheaper than the present system, because all the lawyers and other persons interested would subscribe for that paper, and moreover they would be enabled to get this information quickly.

If you do what the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations proposes the people will be practically without access to the laws that may be passed for months after their passage. The system we have now is better than the one that he proposes, but the one I suggest is better than either. I yield now to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. PURMAN.]

Mr. PURMAN. I desire just one moment to reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

I know not which the controlling purpose was in the minds of the originators of this law; whether to spread the laws before the people for their guidance in advance of their publication in book or pamphlet form, or as a subsidy to aid in the support of newspapers; both, I think. The fathers that first instituted this law certainly gave the people the opportunity of reading the laws conveniently and in time, and did not intend that, like the edicts of Caligula, the people should not be able to read them and yet be subject to their penalties in case of any unknown infraction of them. I am only responsible for the utterances I make, not for the misunderstandings of the gentleman.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. EAMES rose.

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] yields me his remaining minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES.]

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague did not yield to him, but I will.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to propose an amendment that will enable the committee, I think, to vote on the proposition which has been discussed for the last fifteen or twenty minutes, and in this amendment I shall have said all I have to say on the question. I move to strike out the words "provided that," in line 303, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "and;" also to strike out in line 305 the word "cease," and insert instead thereof the word "continue;" so that it will read:

For publishing the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress in pamphlet form and in newspapers, $86,000; and after the 4th day of March, 1875, the publication of the laws in newspapers shall continue.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that amendment proposes to change the existing law; it proposes to enact a law about the publication of the laws in the newspapers, which does not now exist.

Mr. EAMES. It seems to me that the amendment is entirely germane to the proposition reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. EAMES. The amendment I have proposed is entirely in point and in order, inasmuch as it is germane to the proposition which is reported by the committee in the bill. That proposition is that the law shall cease; I propose simply that it shall continue.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regards the amendment as germane to the pending clause of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not make the point that it was not germane The point I made was that it changed existing law.

Mr. EAMES. I raise the point of order on the gentleman that he is not in order in discussing the point unless he appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair has not ruled on the point I raised I said nothing about germane. The amendment is germane, of course, but it changes the existing law. What is reported here in this bill is merely a repetition of what is now the law. The law now provides that the publication of the laws in newspapers shall cease. The proposed amendment is to make a law that such publication shall continue, and that is an absolute change of existing law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suppose that if an appropriation bill undertakes to enact or re-enact a law, and brings that law before the House for re-enactment, it is not only germane but in order to amend that law which the Committee on Appropriations by their bill have brought before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Clearly it is. If not, then we are in this condition: the Committee on Appropriations can bring a proposition before the House which we cannot amend. What is the use of being in Committee of the Whole at all?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to put a case by way of illustration?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Suppose that in the last Congress certain judgeships had been abolished by clear and undisputed provisions of law. Now suppose that by mistake the Committee on Appropriations should put in an appropriation bill an appropriation for the salaries of those judges as if they still existed. Would the gentleman hold that because that appropriation was in the bill by mistake an amendment would be in order reviving those old abolished judgeships?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is not this case. You report us in this bill a proviso and ask us to vote for it. We do not like that proviso, and propose to amend it if we can. I think such an amendment is entirely in order, and I hope the Committee of the Whole will sustain the Chair in his ruling.

Mr. STORM. The Chair has not ruled that the amendment is in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That it is germane.

Mr. STORM. The point is that the amendment is not in order, as proposing to change existing laws.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I hope the Chair will rule that it is in order, and that the committee will hold in accordance with the clear right. Now let me say one word upon the general subject before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled upon the point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will proceed, and the Chair will reserve his decision upon the point until the rule upon the subject can be found.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] having this bill in charge, when the publication of the laws in the newspapers will cease as the law now stands?

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Clerk to read the law as it now is.

The CHAIRMAN. The law and the rule will be read, if deemed necessary, after the gentleman from Massachusetts has concluded his remarks.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to give an item of my experience in regard to the publication of the laws in newspapers. Some years ago the widow of a soldier came to me and said, "Can I not obtain a pension? Is there not such a law, under which I can get it?" I replied that I was not aware that there was any such law. She put her hand in her pocket, pulled out a newspaper, and pointing to a law printed in it said to me, "Is not that a law passed by Congress at its last session?" It turned out that while I was here and ought to have known what laws had been passed, she had found out from a newspaper what the law was, while I did not know it. I sent in her application and she obtained her pension. That shows that people do look at the newspapers.

Now, I think there should be either what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has suggested, an official gazette for the immediate publication of the laws, or they should be published in the newspapers. I am not much in favor of newspapers. But I am surprised that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who spoke so eloquently for the country newspapers some days ago, when we had before us the question of sending their exchanges free through the mails—involving eight times as much as it would cost to publish the laws in the newspapers—I am surprised that he should go back on those papers now.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all. But I do not propose to select two newspapers in a State and neglect all the rest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then rotate.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would not rotate once in eight years.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. At least we can let some of the newspapers have it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I like the idea better of an official bulletin, which we can provide for next year.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Precisely; and in the mean time let this publication continue in the newspapers until the Committee on Appropriations report in favor of that manner of publication.

Mr. GARFIELD. The publication in the newspapers will go on this year.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But you cannot report for the bulletin this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now rule upon the point of order. The proviso reported by the Committee on Appropriations simply reenacts the existing law, which seems to be in conflict with Rule 120. But as that discrepancy has not been observed until now, when it is reached in Committee of the Whole, the Chair regards it as too late to raise the point of order, which should have been reserved in the House before the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is the amendment just offered upon which I raised my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Were all points of order on this bill reserved in the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly they were.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair rules that the point of order raised by the gentleman was well taken.

Mr. EAMES. As the Chair bases his ruling upon the idea that this amendment changes existing law, I wish to call his attention to the fact that the act directing that the publication of the laws in newspapers should cease does not take effect until March 4, 1875.

The CHAIRMAN. By consent the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] has been permitted to proceed with his remarks. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and rules out the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say that the cost of publishing the laws in this form for the second and third sessions of the last Congress was $88,800. This does not include the first session.

Mr. MOREY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. WHEELER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WOODFORD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

DISTRIBUTION OF GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 2987) to provide for the just and equitable distribution of the award made to the United States by the commissioners at Geneva under the treaty of Washington; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of Samuel C. Lowman, William Beaumont, Catharine Lammy, Laney M. Simppers, and Margaret Rutter, praying for pensions, severally to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 17, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the memorial of a large number of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, deprecating the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee, or an increase or revival of internal taxes, and praying that the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, making a reduction of 10 per cent. upon certain duties, may be repealed. This memorial is forwarded to me by a gentleman who requested that I should state in presenting it that the names upon it represent $100,000,000 of capital. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Mrs. Mary W. Jones, widow of the late Commodore Thomas C. Jones, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.
Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present a preamble and resolution adopted at a large meeting of citizens held in the city of Cincinnati the other evening, at the Opera House, protesting against any increase of irredeemable paper currency as dangerous to our material interests, destructive of our national credit, and demoralizing to the community. They set forth at length the grounds of belief why such a measure would be injurious. I move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Finance.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. At a meeting of the Board of Trade of the city of Portland, Maine, sundry resolutions deprecating an increase of paper money were adopted, concluding with this resolution:

> That the members of Congress from this State be, and they are hereby, requested to oppose the passage of any act tending to the expansion of the paper currency; and to use their influence to promote a return to specie payments at the earliest possible day.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1616) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittaning, Pennsylvania, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.
Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California, remonstrating against the granting of an additional subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 715) to repeal sections 3 and 6 of the act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1873, approved June 1, 1872.
The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 716) for the better government of the Navy of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. SCOTT. If there be no further morning business, in pursuance of the notice given yesterday morning, I now move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 350, providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance to the amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out the following proviso in section 1:

Provided further, That said Secretary shall pay no money under any of the provisions of this act, nor shall the Secretary of War take possession of said canal as authorized by the next section, until the State of Kentucky shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way to assess said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee to the amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out in section 2, commencing in line 44, the following words:

And no money shall be paid under the provisions of this act until all claims for said taxes shall have been released.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance to the amendment of the House of Representatives was to insert as section 4, at the end of the House amendment, the following:

SEC. 4. That if at any time it becomes necessary to enforce the lien of the mortgage upon said canal property for the benefit of the bondholders, it shall be lawful for the trustees named in said mortgage, or any other trustees who may be appointed in pursuance of the laws of Kentucky, to commence proceedings therein in any court having jurisdiction thereof, with notice to the United States as terre tenant pro forma, and serve process upon any officer of the United States who shall have the superintendence of said canal, whose duty it shall be to notify the Attorney-General of the United States of such service; whereupon said Attorney-General shall enter an appearance in said case and take all necessary steps to represent and defend the interests of the United States in such proceedings, so that the same may be conducted in the same manner and with the like effect as if the said Louisville and Portland Canal Company were still in existence as a corporation.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to hear the reason for that amendment. I believe the proposition is to insert those words.

Mr. SCOTT. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin the reason why that section is inserted. In the appropriation act of 1872, which appropriated either two or three hundred thousand dollars—I do not now remember the exact amount—for the completion of the enlargement of this canal, a condition was inserted reducing the tolls to five cents per ton. The directors of the canal, when officers of the United States undertook to complete the enlargement and expend that money, resisted their right to do so upon the ground that if they permitted that work to be done by that appropriation it would be an acceptance of the limitation of five cents per ton of tolls, and that the acceptance of that limitation endangered the security of the bondholders who were secured by this mortgage. Upon their so resisting, the United States officers made application to Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, for an injunction to restrain the directors from interfering with the United States officers. The circuit and district judge and the justice of the United States Supreme Court assigned to that circuit all being absent at the time, Justice Miller for that reason entertained jurisdiction and issued the injunction, and in doing so he delivered an opinion stating that the corporation was still in existence, and that it was the duty of these directors to see that no act was done which would impair the security of the bondholders; and while the court held that the appropriation was not dependent upon the condition, and enjoined the directors from interfering with the United States officers, the opinion still does hold that until the United States shall take possession of the work the corporation does exist and the bondholders have the right to insist upon this security.

It is only for the purpose of not interfering with the rights of these bondholders under the mortgage and providing for them a remedy in case this appropriation should fail, keeping ourselves within the strict line of that opinion and not impairing private rights, that this section is added.

Mr. HOWE. It may be advisable to put that in, but for one I think I have detected here an effort to be too anxious about private rights. The first section of this bill appropriates a sum of money to pay for these bonds and to extinguish the lien upon the work. The last section provides a method of allowing the bondholders to foreclose. I should think either of these remedies would be sufficient. Both of them strike me to be quite too much. Under the last section dishonest officers, in spite of your payment of the bonds, can enable the bondholders to regain possession of this canal which has been out of the hands of the United States a great many years. I do not know of any two acts in the history of government more problematical than seem to me the two acts of allowing these directors to keep possession of this work after the work had been all paid for except $500, and the other act very much like it of allowing them to put a mortgage upon it. But that is all past; that is in the history.

I really hope this amendment will not be incorporated in the bill. It looks too much like the legislation that we have had heretofore on the subject. Of course, if the bonds are paid, I do not see myself that the bondholders could get any remedy under this last section; but there is just as much reason for providing for a writ of ejectment and half a dozen other remedies as the two. The first one seems to me to be sufficient.

Mr. SCOTT. I appreciate in full the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Wisconsin; and if it shall be necessary to enter into a general discussion of this question, shall join with him in characterizing this as the most extraordinary proceeding that has, I think, illustrated American history.

But let me call his attention to the fact that this provision is in the very line of accomplishing what he desires to see accomplished. These five directors have once sought to interpose their authority for the purpose of preventing the United States from doing what they wished to do with this canal. Under this opinion of Justice Miller the corporation still exists. We now make an appropriation for the purpose of paying the bonds, which will not be due the first of them for three years, the others running to nine, ten, and perhaps thirteen years. The mortgage exists; and under that opinion the bondholders have the right to have their interests taken care of by these directors. Now, then, if the appropriation is applied to the purpose for which it is made, they can have no further use for that mortgage; it will be extinguished by the payment of the bonds; and it is only out of extreme caution, so that these directors shall have no pretext whatever upon recurrence to that decision for maintaining their possession of this canal, that this provision is inserted giving the bondholders a remedy in case it should ever become necessary. I agree with my friend that the strong probability is that it will never be called into requisition, it will be useless; that the money will be paid; but the desire of the committee was, looking to this decision, to give no excuse to any one by which the prompt possession of this canal by the Government could hereafter be interfered with.

Mr. HOWE. But do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that the court decided that this board of directors was bound to keep possession of this work to protect the bondholders?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will read what the court said.

Mr. HOWE. I should be glad to hear what they said in that direction.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Justice Miller, who granted the injunction, used this language:

But while these considerations prove the continued existence of the corporation, the validity of the contract by which they pledged the canal and its revenues for the money borrowed for its extension, and its duty to secure and protect this revenue, and to do all that may lawfully be done to prevent its destruction or diversion from that purpose, it is still true that the directors of this corporation occupy a very peculiar position, and one widely different from the directors of railroads, insurance companies, and other corporations for private gain. The United States is the only stockholder of this corporation. The directors have really no personal interest in the corporation or its property. They are, to all purposes, what equity calls trustees without an interest, the depositaries of a naked trust. For whom do they hold this trust, and for whose benefit must they exercise it? This inquiry, though lying at the foundation of the question to be solved here, is fortunately not a difficult one. There are three parties interested deeply in this trust, and in the manner in which its duties shall be discharged, which I name in the order of the superiority of their claims rather than their importance: 1. The holders of the bonds, secured by the mortgage authorized and placed under a twofold legislative sanction, by the Legislature of Kentucky and the Congress of the United States; 2. The United States, the holder of all the stock in the corporation, expending $1,000,000 besides for the benefit of the canal; and 3. The public, the community, to whose use, free of all charges but those necessary to keep it in operation, it has been solemnly dedicated by the Legislature of Kentucky, by the Congress of the United States, and by the action of the corporation itself, as well as by all the acts of all those parties from 1842 to the present time, so soon as the enlargement is completed and the debt thereby created discharged.

Mr. HOWE. I do not think there is anything in that opinion, as I understand it, which calls for any such legislation as this section.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will allow me, I will read further. The Senator from Kentucky has quoted from the report of the committee, I believe.

Mr. STEVENSON. I read a paragraph of the decision from the committee's report.

Mr. SCOTT. Proceeding further the court say:

As regards the first of these—

That is, the bondholders:

As regards the first of these I have no hesitation in expressing my entire conviction that the bondholders have a lien upon the revenue of the canal, and a right to insist that the corporation shall protect those revenues to the extent necessary to make entirely safe the payment of their debt and its accruing interest; and that, until that debt is paid, or the mortgage satisfied or otherwise discharged, with the consent of these bondholders, this right of theirs remains, with the corresponding duty of the directors of the corporation. But the right of these creditors is limited to this, and, so long as their security is unimpaired, it is the duty of the directors to advance the other interests I have mentioned, for which they are trustees.

Mr. HOWE. The court hit the law there, or missed it, one of the two. If the court hit the law, that does not call for the fourth section, but it will prohibit another section here in which you undertake to reduce the tolls. What I understand Justice Miller to have said there was that it is the business of the directors to take care of the revenues so that the bondholders shall get their money. If that is their duty, (which I do not believe, let me say, in passing,) then you must not reduce the tolls.

But can we be mistaken about the law of this matter? If I mortgage my house to my friend from Pennsylvania and sell the equity of redemption to my friend from New York, am I therefore, after that sale, going to keep him out of possession upon any pretense that I must keep possession of the fee in order to see that the mortgagee will not lose his lien and be cheated out of his interest?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator to look at this point: Here the Government takes possession, and the Government cannot be sued; and this provision was not put in to reserve the lien, for another section does that, but this section was intended to give the bondholders a remedy in the remote and uncertain and improbable condition of the company not complying with the law. It is to avoid a complaint of a possible injustice. I do not think myself it is a matter of much practical moment, because I have no doubt the Government of the United States will do what is required to be done; but this will give the bondholders a remedy, and take away all excuse for interfering with the operation of the law.

Mr. HOWE. I really do not believe myself that except under some administration of the Government like that which has prevailed in reference to this work heretofore, the bondholders can get the money due on their bonds and get the work both; but if they do that, they will only be just as lucky as the directors have been, for they have got the money and they have had the work for ten or fifteen years.

Mr. SCOTT. Permit me to put this case to my friend: This is a corporate mortgage; the only tenure by which that corporation holds its existence is the retention of their stock by five stockholders. When these five stockholders shall have been paid under the operation of this law, then there can no longer any corporate existence be maintained.

Mr. HOWE. And should not be.

Mr. SCOTT. And should not be. We extinguish by virtue of that operation the State corporation. Now if by any accident whatever this appropriation becomes unavailing and the rights asserted to exist in these bondholders is to be enforced, upon whom could service be made, or how could these bondholders enforce their remedy upon that mortgage, the corporation being out of existence and the United States being the owner and in possession? While I do not feel like standing upon this section if the friends of the bill deem that it is unnecessary and objectionable, still I do wish to keep within such limits as that these five directors can no longer have a pretext to stand upon in resisting the possession to be taken by the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say one word to my friend from Wisconsin. His disposition to do what is considered to be right in this matter is highly appreciated by those who feel an immediate interest in the bill. It does seem to me that it would be wise to insert this last section in the bill. It is true that a former section provides that these bonds shall be paid and makes an appropriation for that payment, or rather continues an appropriation heretofore made. But it is barely possible that there may be a difference of opinion between the Secretary of the Treasury and a bondholder as to what is the amount due on his bond. Such a case is supposable; and therefore that it may not be said that we have taken away from any of the bondholders or the trustees representing them a right of action to which they are now entitled, or to which they would be entitled if this legislation did not pass, I think it would be well to have this clause in. We have seen what obstacles will be thrown in the way, how injunctions will be asked for, and I do not want any such ground for an injunction alleged as that we have deprived these parties of any right of action that otherwise but for this legislation they would be entitled to. My own impression is that nothing will ever be done under it; I am sure nothing will ever be done under the section, for the bonds will be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury; he is directed to pay them and money is appropriated to pay them; and that will be the end of the business. The section, therefore, can do no possible harm, but it may reconcile persons who have some objections to the bill or some scruples about it, and it may obviate any question as to whether we have deprived parties of a right of action. I hope the bill as reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate will now be passed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to add a single observation to what has been so well said by my brother Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] that under this mortgage there were originally in the mortgage two trustees, the late James Guthrie and Mr. Isaac Caldwell. Mr. Isaac Caldwell is now the sole surviving trustee, and under that mortgage he has a right to appropriate the annual revenues of the canal to the interest on the bonds. That is a contract protected by the Constitution of the United States, as held by Mr. Justice Miller. While I agree that there would be no necessity for this section, yet if that trustee shall attempt to interpose, as he might deem it his duty to do, not to let anybody come into possession over whom he will have no control to appropriate the annual tolls, the section is inserted for greater protection. I hope the honorable Senator from Wisconsin will see that while it can do no harm, it will remove all temporary objections to the early passage of this remedial measure, and then we shall be done with the business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the House amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I shall not call for the yeas and nays on this proposition. I confess my surprise to find the Committee on Finance, and distinguished lawyers like those from Ohio and Kentucky, insisting on this double remedy; but inasmuch as they do insist upon it, I am to suppose that they are right and that I am wrong. I, however, am utterly opposed to any such legislation. I think it is as faulty as, and more faulty than, any legislation I have ever known here. I do not see any justification for it in the world.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Buckingham, Cragin, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, West, and Windom—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Carpenter, Conkling, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Ingalls, and Spencer—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sprague, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Wright—31.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the House of Representatives as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have the gentleman in charge of this bill or those who are in favor of it inform the Senate under what provision of the Constitution it is that the United States have the authority to become the proprietors of the stock in this private corporation of the State of Kentucky, and to enter into this agreement with the State of Kentucky or with the corporation to get possession of this piece of property and hold it for the United States. It seems a little puzzling to me. Undoubtedly anybody who lives on the Ohio River knows all about it; but I should be glad to have a little information on that topic.

Mr. SCOTT. It has never been my fortune to live in any place where people take knowledge by intuition because they live on the banks of the Ohio River; but the question which the Senator from Vermont puts is one which would have been very pertinent as far back as 1828 or 1829. It was then, in those early days, that the United States was authorized to take stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal, and by virtue of two successive acts of Congress, I believe, stock was taken in the Louisville and Portland Canal until the United States became the owner of twenty hundred and ninety-two shares. I can only suppose that the authority that was invoked at the time, for I have not looked at the history of the legislation, was that if the United States had the power to regulate commerce and for that purpose to improve the Ohio River, the argument was that they had as good a right to take stock for the purpose of making a canal as they had to dig the canal through the falls. The purpose was to make the Ohio River navigable at that point; and these falls (a bed of rocks extending, according to my recollection, some four or five feet in height clear across the channel of the Ohio River at that point and damming back the water some eleven or twelve miles) constituted such an obstruction as that the commerce of the river had to get around it in some way. The United States did become the owner of that much stock; and by operation of the agreement entered into under the acts of 1842 and 1844 of the Kentucky Legislature, the United States became the owner of all of the stock in the canal except five shares. The improvement virtually is the property of the Government of the United States, unless some one can find such vice in the legislation by virtue of which it has become the owner as to defeat its title, and I do not know whether that is the purpose of the Senator from Vermont in making the inquiry or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Partly that; but I also wanted to know about the Constitution; for, although it is a very old instrument, I still have some respect for it. I should like to know also, if the Senator can inform me, what has become of this original corporation? Is that still in existence—the Louisville and Portland Canal Company?

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator had been in his seat a few moments ago and heard what I stated to the Senator from Wisconsin he would have understood the condition of the corporation. In 1855, in pursuance of the act of Kentucky, the United States had become the owner of all the shares in the corporation but five; the directors proffered possession of the property and a transfer of those five shares, which. I take it, if it had then been accepted and the formal transfer made, would have dissolved the State corporation; but the Secretary of the Treasury requested those five gentlemen to hold those five shares of stock so that the form of corporate existence might be maintained. They did consent to hold it, and have ever since, by numerous communications with the Treasury Department, and as late as 1867, in a letter of their president, acknowledged the fiduciary relation which they held toward this work; that they are simply trustees, and that the Government is the beneficiary and entitled to the property. It may be that the formal and corporate existence of the corporation has been kept up by their retaining these five shares and continuing to act as directors; but I think the Senator from Vermont and I would not disagree in this, that if the five shares were now transferred to the United States or purchased, that would be ipso facto a dissolution of that State corporation, for there would be no longer any person eligible to the offices which are requisite to keep it in corporate existence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it be a dissolution of the corporation until the term of the existing directors expired?

Mr. SCOTT. They cannot hold unless they are stockholders; and if the whole stock is extinguished and becomes the property of the United States, no one would be eligible as a director.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But let me suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that the fact that a single person owns all the stock in a corporation does not make that person the owner of the property of the corporation. They are two distinct personalities. He does not own the property because he owns all the stock. He is a member of the corporation, but the corporation owns the property, and the corporation is the creature of the State. Now suppose the corporation, being the creature of the State, be dissolved by having committed suicide, if you please, then rather a serious question arises, what becomes of the franchise, the right to levy tolls, the property of the corporation, and all the functions which had been breathed into its existence solely by the act of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky?

I had the impression that when a corporation expired, dissolved for a violation of its charter in not keeping up its organization, the sovereignty that granted that life resumed it, and that every faculty and function that belonged to the corporation would immediately escheat, so to speak, would immediately lapse into the sovereignty of the State that created the corporation; and I have yet to be informed of any decision of any court or any principle of law otherwise than that. How it would be in respect to the mere physical property that existed and of which the corporation were owners, as horses, or cattle, or lands, if you please, on the dissolution of the corporation, might be another question. If the charter were forfeited, as it would be forfeited in the strict sense by the omission to comply with its requirements as to keeping up the board of directors in a proper way, then on a forfeiture a very grave question would exist whether the property itself would not be forfeited to the State.

Mr. THURMAN. The State has agreed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Ohio says "the State has agreed." He will pardon me for saying that I think he may possibly take a somewhat prejudiced view of the subject without knowing it, on account of the deep interest his people feel in this question. I submit to my friend from Ohio that the question is whether the State of Kentucky has agreed in a manner that binds her now that she will renounce to the United States, or has renounced conditionally to the United States on the happening of the event of the United States owning all the stock, all the faculties and franchises over that property that she had imparted to the corporation. I do not so read those two acts that are quoted in the report. I have not given them a very careful examination, because they have not been called to my attention until now; but, as I understood them on a hasty reading, they do not come up to the point of saying or meaning, construed as they must be at last in a court of justice, that the State of Kentucky on the happening of this event does in præsenti, or does by a promise which is binding upon her, or which is co-extensive with that idea, binding or not, declare that all the faculties that that corporation is possessed of now, the franchises, as they are called, of levying tolls, of regulating passage, exercising dominion which otherwise the sovereignty of the State might exercise, shall go over into the jurisdiction of the United States. The question therefore would arise, supposing this corporation to be dissolved and the United States to come to be the private owner, where the United States is to get the authority to levy tolls upon the citizens of that State within her own jurisdiction for passing through this public river? It may be that it would be answered that the United States has inherent authority to levy tolls upon everybody that passes through a particular public river in a particular State and not upon every other; but whether that would be laying imposts, taxes, &c., equally would be a question that I think could be pretty easily answered.

So then, Mr. President, I do not say it in any spirit of opposition to this bill, but only in the spirit of inquiry and suggestion. It appears to me that before we take any step which shall dissolve this corporation, we ought to be perfectly sure that by the broad and present and full grant of the State of Kentucky the franchises of this corporation, the perpetual right to levy tolls upon the citizens of Kentucky going up and down that public river and through these locks, shall be carried over to the United States, as well as the exclusive territorial jurisdiction over the land and the necessary surroundings of these falls, as well as the agreement and renunciation of any right to impose any conditions or other things upon the property. It may be that it can be proved beyond doubt that all this has been done; but I have a sort of presentiment, looking at these two statutes, that by and by, and under different conditions of things, when different feelings prevail from what now prevail, there will be found to be not only serious but insuperable difficulty in maintaining the rights of the United States for which we have paid so much money. I hope I am wrong.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not want to occupy time, for I hope there will be a vote on this bill this morning. I cannot, however, help observing that this is the most extraordinary thing I have ever witnessed. Here is the United States owning all this property but five shares, and the owners of those five shares have filed their written agreement to transfer them to the United States upon receiving par with interest from 1864, and hold them on that condition, and we are ready to pay the money to them and they are ready to receive it. That is the condition of the United States.

On the other hand, the State of Kentucky has said by two acts of the Legislature to the United States, "Take this property upon condition that you shall not charge any more tolls than are necessary to keep the canal in repair;" and here is the State of Kentucky, under whose authority, or with whose license at least, we have done what we have done, saying to us, "Take your property, and all we ask of you is that you shall charge no more toll than is necessary to keep the canal in repair, and upon that condition you shall have it when you become the whole owner," that is when we get these five shares which are ready for our purchase, and the written agreement to sell them to us is on file. When we get them, then says the State of Kentucky to the United States, "You shall have complete sovereignty over this canal." And now there is a question about whether or not some old corporation will be dissolved. Dissolved how? We have no power to dissolve it by an act of Congress, and if the Legislature of Kentucky has not undertaken to dissolve it in express terms, if it is dissolved it must be simply because of the fact that one party, the United States, will have become the entire holder of the stock so that the machinery provided for in the charter can no longer be used. Suppose that to be so, will the property then lapse to the State of Kentucky? No, sir; under her legislation it is impossible to question the title of the United States to hold the property. Then we shall be in possession of our property, an artificial water-way constructed mainly by the money of the United States, and owned by the United States; and who doubts the power of levying a sufficient tax to keep that property in repair?

I do not wish to argue any longer. I hope we may come to a vote.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the other day when the House amendments came here they seemed to challenge the wisdom of our action in two respects, and to these two points special attention was called in the discussion which at once ensued. After some debate touching the committee to be selected, the whole matter was referred to the Committee on Finance, in order that upon the two points to which I shall refer the Senate might be enlightened and instructed. I beg to call the attention of the Senate again to these two points and to the treatment they have received at the hands of the committee.

It was said in the first place, as the Senator from Vermont has said this morning, that doubt, in spite of argument, must exist unless provision was made to allay it, whether the transfer of this property from Kentucky to the United States would, without something more than the Senate had done, become complete and perfect. It was said that the action of this Government, some of it by the President under the administration of Mr. Pierce, some of it departmental under the action of Departments, and some of it congressional, following the acts of 1842 and 1844 of the Kentucky Legislature, had not effected, and would not under the Senate bill effect, a complete, clear, and final transfer to the United States. Bearing on this question we had before us among other things an act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, which, as it is brief, I will read—an act passed in 1872 after everything had occurred which has yet occurred tending to assist our title. In 1872 the Legislature of the State of Kentucky thus enacted, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont, he having been absent when it was read the other day:

That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company are hereby authorized and directed to surrender the said canal, and all the property connected therewith, to the Government of the United States, upon the following terms and conditions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is that?

Mr. CONKLING. Nowhere—before us in our proceedings. I read it for the purpose of observing that the treatment which has been given it by the committee is to ignore it altogether. It nowhere appears, I think, in the printed report, nor is any allusion made to it, doubtless upon the theory——

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator will find that he is mistaken if he will read the report again.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my honorable friend show it to me in the report? Perhaps I use too broad an expression when I say it is not referred to at all. As I said yesterday I read the report in a street-car, that being the only opportunity I have had to read it.

Mr. SCOTT. I will call the Senator's attention to this clause in the report of the committee:

All her acts of legislation, instead of asserting such a right, have looked to the end of making this commerce free from all tolls, except such as are necessary to keep up this canal. Even her act of 1872 repeats this purpose, acknowledges the ownership of the United States, and among the conditions sought to be imposed, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon of the Senator for overlooking this. I beg now to read——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator permit me to state that in order to avoid repetition the report of the House was merely referred to, but we did not wish to reprint it. If he will refer to the House report, I think he will find the act of 1872 in full.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to be very brief, and will first read the residue of this act of Kentucky of 1872:

Upon the following terms and conditions:

1. That the Government of the United States shall not levy tolls on said canal, except such as shall be necessary to keep the same in repair, pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements.

2. That the city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as said city may deem proper: Provided always, That said bridges shall be so located as not to interfere with the use of the canal, and so constructed as not to interfere with its navigation.

3. That the title and possession of the United States of said canal shall not interfere with the right of the State to serve criminal and civil processes, or with the State's general police power over the territory covered by the said canal and its appendages.

4. And further, that the city of Louisville shall at all times have the right of drainage into said canal: Provided, That the connections between the drains and the canal shall be made upon the plan to keep out mud and garbage.

5. That the use of the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever to the actual owners of the property contiguous to said canal, its branches and dams, subject to such restrictions and regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Department of the United States Government which may have charge of the said canal.

6. That the Government of the United States shall, before such surrender, discharge all the debts due by said canal company, and purchase the stock of said directors.

Such is the act of the State of Kentucky passed in 1872. Correcting my statement that the committee make no reference to it, I read now the words of the report:

All her acts of legislation—

Says the committee—

instead of asserting such a right, have looked to the end of making this commerce free from all tolls, except such as are necessary to keep up this canal. Even her act of 1872 repeats this purpose, acknowledges the ownership of the United States, and among the conditions sought to be imposed for the local advantage of Louisville, no attempt is made to include the acknowledgment of the right to tax for either State or municipal purposes.

That is the only observation, as I understand my friend, the committee has deemed it necessary to bestow upon the statute.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask my friend a question, whether we have any right to comply with that stipulation of Kentucky? Is not that an express stipulation that the United States will surrender its sovereign right to tax all the commerce that goes down the Ohio River forever, and limit it to what is necessary for the purposes of that canal? Can this Congress make a stipulation with a State to surrender its right or to limit its right to tax commerce?

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator from New Jersey assert that Congress has the right to levy a tax on the commerce passing down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers in the natural channel?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I assert that the United States has the right to tax the commerce that passes down that canal.

Mr. THURMAN. Ah!

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And all the commerce that passes down the Ohio River passes down that canal, and I assert that we have not the right to surrender that sovereign power.

Mr. CONKLING. The question of the Senator from New Jersey, like the omission of the report, suggests to my mind the idea that my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, who drew the report, felt warranted in ignoring altogether the act of 1872. He and the committee cannot have given it force, it seems to me, looking at the amendments they have reported and looking at the remarks they make.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that the House report, which is in terms made a part of the report of our committee, as it was not necessary to print it over again, contains every one of these acts, and among them the very act he has read. I can furnish him with a copy if he desires. The report made by the House committee was in favor of this bill. The House report contains not only that, but all the acts except the two recited in this report. I do not know of a single act of either Congress or the Legislature of Kentucky that is not either recited or pretty fully stated in the House report.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend misapprehends me if he supposes that I mean to intimate that the committee tried to keep this act away from us or not to inform us of it. The point of my observation is that this act, being the foundation of one objection made to the Senate bill and of one argument in favor of the House bill, being one chief point referred to the committee, the committee come back with no observation whatever regarding it except the one read, and which had escaped me, and I have begged pardon for not observing it. The committee has virtually ignored it altogether. It appears, we are told in the House report, and I have a right to say because that argument lies on our table, that the House in the presence of that act, and with that act cited in its report, has adopted an amendment the very purpose of which was to guard us against the effect of that act, so that we have not only the House report—if we can find it, I have not seen it—but we have the action of the House vindicating the propriety of citing and regarding that act, because the gravamen of the action of the House is to guard against the effect which might come from it.

Mr. President, I do not wish to consume time and I pass on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, which is the Louisiana bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I trust the Senator from Nebraska, who I believe has the floor, will permit the bill under consideration to go over informally that the Senator from New York may conclude his remarks, and I hope that we may be able to finish this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TIPTON. I will yield for fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. I will endeavor to occupy but a brief space. I leave the point which I have suggested, with the observation that the act of Kentucky of 1872 is either null and void, or its effects are those which I can hardly suppose the Senator would accept as a condition upon which we are to acquire property. I will not dilate upon it, because I promised to occupy but little time.

I come to the only remaining topic to which I ask attention. It was said by the House bill—I will not refer to the proceedings in the House—that except we adopted additional safeguards, whatever law had sustained Kentucky in laying taxes upon this corporation and whatever warrant the United States had for taxing it as the property of a Kentucky corporation would continue, and I think I may say this was another question, or suggested another question, referred to the Committee on Finance. Now I ask the attention of the Senate to the treatment which the committee has given that subject. The report says:

If efforts have been made to impose taxes by the city government of Louisville, it must have been on the ground that, so long as the form of corporate existence is maintained, the canal is the property of the State corporation, within the jurisdiction of the State and city.

I ask the attention of Senators now to this language in the report:

We are not informed that the State has at any time imposed taxes upon it, and the claim asserted by the city of Louisville has been withdrawn.

That is the conclusion and observation of the committee.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. My question is this: suppose the committee had told us that the city of Louisville insisted upon the power to tax, and the State of Kentucky had instructed this corporation not to surrender the work but to resist the right of the United States to take possession of it—suppose, I say, the committee had reported that instead of what they have reported, what would the Senator say, in view of all the money we have paid, was the right and the power and the remedy of the United States in reference to it?

Mr. CONKLING. I should say, Mr. President, then, that the remedy would be found in the best judgment the Senate could form on the facts, and by parity of reason I say that the best remedy is not the best judgment to be formed by the Senate in the absence of the facts, or with the facts misstated, however unintentionally. I mean this to be a frank answer to my honorable friend from Wisconsin. Now I will conclude my statement.

The point of the committee's assertion is that they are not informed that the State of Kentucky has at any time imposed taxes upon the canal. I read now from the report of the canal company for 1846, not having the report before me, but having the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which the report is cited. The report of the canal company says:

It will be noticed, by an item in this account, that the State of Kentucky has taxed the entire property and franchises of the canal: consequently no stockholder can be holden to give in the amount of his stock for taxation, and thus be subjected to a double tax.

Without venturing to criticise the committee—my remarks are not in that spirit at all—I must say that I cannot understand how the Committee on Finance can report to the Senate that they are not informed that the State has at any time imposed taxes upon this canal when the report of the corporation, made I think under the requirement of law, informs us that the State of Kentucky has asserted the right to lay taxes, that it has taxed it year in and year out; and not only so, but that the United States, year after year, has also taxed the corporation as if it were a private corporation liable, like any other corporation existing in the State of Kentucky, to pay taxes. I say again, as I said the other day, that it is quite unnecessary to remind any lawyer of the absurdity, in view of the understanding prevailing in some parts of this Chamber now, as to the ownership of this property, which ownership has been fixed at least since 1855, as was argued the other day, of the United States taxing property and a structure of its own; but the answer of the committee is that they are not informed that any such thing has been done by Kentucky, although here are the reports made by the corporation showing not only taxation by the State of Kentucky, but taxation by the United States.

As part of the same matter, the committee observe that the claim asserted by the city of Louisville has been withdrawn. Withdrawn? I am not sure that I know the length and breadth of that word, but if it be the word to employ here it is because of the proceeding. I will read in a moment.

The city of Louisville has been maintaining a suit for $114,000 of unpaid taxes due by the canal company.

The other day—and on a day only just before the action in the House, and on a day subsequent to these objections being made public—the common council of the city of Louisville passed this resolution:

Be it resolved by the general council of the city of Louisville, That the city attorney be, and he is hereby, directed to suspend action in the suit now pending against the Louisville and Portland Canal Company for taxes; and in the event that said canal property should pass into the hands of the General Government, the city of Louisville hereby relinquishes all right, title, and interest whatever she may have in any claim for taxes against it.

I should say that a definition of the word "withdrawn" which would be satisfied by that resolution is a mild definition. Louisville directs her attorney of record to suspend proceedings now in that suit, and she says that in the event of a certain fact being accomplished, to wit, the consummation of the transfer and making over of this entire property, franchises, and ownership to the United States she relinquishes her claim for delinquent taxes. I repeat if that means "withdrawn" in the past tense, the word is mildly defined.

Mr. President, I have done with this subject, I hope; and I say, before resuming my seat that although interesting to the States adjacent and interesting to the Senators from those States, I do not accept the idea that the subject is in its nature local, or that it is far-fetched for Senators from other States to discuss it, or that their, doing so verges toward intrusion.

Mr. THURMAN. Who has said so?

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend from Ohio has some reason for asking that question. He has not said it in so many words——

Mr. THURMAN. The question is so far from being local that it is addressed to half the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will allow me I will say that he did not make the suggestion in so many words, but with that aptitude of language and that wealth of adaptation which belongs to him, it pleased the honorable Senator the other day to call attention to the fact and in connection with it to express his surprise that Senators from Kentucky did not rise to make any objection, and he intimated that it is remarkable that Senators from remote States should be those to start doubts touching the right to tax and touching the rights Kentucky would have and touching the results of this legislation. I do not borrow his phrases, but I render their meaning, and I think my honorable friend was the originator of the idea, as he is very likely to be the originator of the most valuable ideas which come to the Senate.

Mr. President, I have only to say that it falls to the lot of the State of New York to pay about one-fifth or one-sixth of the taxes gathered in the Union. It sometimes falls to the lot of that State to pay one-third of the entire tax, as it did when the income tax prevailed. Having in her borders one-eleventh of the population of the Republic, she paid one-third of that tax; and therefore I think any of her representatives in Congress, the humblest of them, need not apologize for raising his voice upon a question involving an alternative of paying two or three million dollars for something or for nothing, to buy a lawsuit or an assortment of lawsuits, or to buy a canal, as the case may be. And by as much as New York is interested in the question of devoting the money to this use, by so much is she interested also in freeing a great channel of commerce from tolls, emancipating it, and setting it free in all its activities and all its opportunities; and my friend from Kentucky may rely upon it that no representative from New York will be found so ignorant or so recreant as to attempt to interpose against any legislation wholesome in character the design and effect of which will be to nourish the commerce of the country, be it on the Ohio River or on any other stream which flows on a line of latitude or a line of longitude anywhere in all our borders.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. I know how vigilant the Senators from New York are in everything appertaining to the appropriation of the public money, and how faithful they are in the execution of every other duty within the scope of their senatorial trusts; but I desire to ask the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] if the United States has not already appropriated over $1,400,000 to this work, and what objection of a public nature can there be to the immediate possession of this property by the United States, in order that this canal may be free? Let the Senate notice that this is not a contest between Kentucky and the United States. By no means. That Commonwealth desires the passage of this bill. Kentucky has pledged her faith, unsullied and spotless from the hour she became a State in this Confederacy until now, that she surrenders the jurisdiction over this canal to the United States, and all her legislation has been in fulfillment of that pledge.

The opposition to this bill is most surprising. The bill involves the simple possession of a work of which the United States have already become the exclusive owner, subject to an outstanding mortgage debt not yet due, and which the Government of the United States has assumed and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay as it matures, with the annual interest thereon. Whence this opposition? Kentucky interposes no objection. The bondholders who retain their mortgage lien, and who acquire an additional assumpsit of the United States for principal and interest of their debt, do not object. The people of the Ohio and Mississippi Valley, whose commerce is crippled and burdened by an onerous tax of five cents per ton on every boat, upon its registered tonnage or capacity to carry freight irrespective of its being loaded or empty, which it is the object of this bill to remove, demand prompt passage.

Five directors of this canal in Louisville, men of high character and credit I admit, alone antagonize with this measure. They seem to desire its defeat. These gentlemen have really no interest in the corporation or its property. They are dry trustees. They hold by request of the Secretary of the Treasury one share of stock each, which they have agreed to surrender when the United States takes possession and makes the canal free. These gentlemen receive from annual tolls something like $350,000 a year. They make no annual report of their actings and doings, being expressly exempted by law from this requisition of their charter. High as I admit the character of these five directors to be, I insist their private interests must yield to the public good. I protest against the continuance of this onerous tax upon the commerce of the Ohio Valley. I deny the right of these directors to oppose the prompt possession by the United States of a work owned by the Government, and in which they have no interest. I tell the honorable Senator from New York he need have no fear from any asserted jurisdiction by Kentucky over the canal. That Commonwealth desires it to be as far free as possible.

The Senator reads to us extracts from the reports of the directors of this corporation to show that the State of Kentucky has constantly taxed this canal. That may have been so in the past; I did not think it was so now. It will not and cannot be so when the United States becomes possessed of it and dedicates it as part and parcel of a great commercial highway. The Senator also alludes to a claim of the city of Louisville for a large amount of money for taxes in arrears for past years, which he admits has been for the present discontinued. The solicitor for the city of Louisville has given a written legal opinion, as I am informed, that the municipal authorities of Louisville have no corporate power to tax this canal. I think the Senator may rest secure from all claim on that score. Were there anything in the several specious objections cited by the honorable Senator from New York save that of jurisdiction—which has been ceded already—their existence would not militate against the possession of this canal by the United States; but that very possession would become a complete bar to their successful maintenance. I sincerely trust it may be the pleasure of the Senate to pass this bill at once.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair will remind the Senator from New York that the fifteen minutes yielded by the Senator from Nebraska have expired. Does the Senator from Nebraska resume the floor or yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CONKLING. I have no care about proceeding. I only want to occupy two or three minutes more in reply to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. TIPTON. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, disclaiming all wish or willingness to pluck one laurel from the brow of Kentucky, I wish to ask her distinguished Senator whether his eulogium, doubtless deserved, upon the spotless faith and legislative integrity of Kentucky, applies to the act of 1872 as well as to other acts?

Mr. STEVENSON. I take it that when Kentucky surrendered her sovereignty by the act of 1842 all acts in pari materia are to be construed together.

Mr. CONKLING. If I could get the honorable Senator to answer my question precisely, I should be even more obliged to him than I am. My wish was to get his view in reference to the act of 1872 and to know whether he deems that act effectual and a part of the legislation to which he refers when he says that Kentucky is anxious to put out of her hands and into the hands of the United States the Louisville and Portland Canal.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the Senator from New York say that the act of 1872 is a repeal of the act of 1842?

Mr. CONKLING. I never suggested that.

Mr. STEVENSON. What does the Senator desire me to say then? I say I include all the acts of Kentucky. I said that when I was up before. I say that this act of 1872 is but confirmatory of the act by which Kentucky did surrender all her sovereignty when the United States should become sole owner.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I think I shall be right in saying that my honorable friend is of opinion that that transaction which we are now consummating is to leave or may leave forever imposed upon the United States six conditions, one of which is a denial of the right of the Government to charge tolls upon this canal, or to allow it to lapse, or to leave it unimproved or unrepaired; another of which preserves forever the water rights of owners; another of which forever permits the city of Louisville to empty her sewers into the canal, and another to bridge it, and two others to which I do not stop to refer.

Mr. President, I believe that Kentucky intends to be and wishes to be fair, frank, and truthful, and I believe, looking at the act of 1872 and at the previous acts, that there is one way and only one in which this matter can be made exactly and clearly right, and that is for the Legislature of Kentucky to do that which upon all these statutes I cannot affirm that she has done, namely, to bring about a state of things which Senators on all sides profess to have in view.

It is said that the Legislature of Kentucky meets but once in two years; it is said that it would be some trouble for the Legislature to come together at Frankfort even for a single day and wash its hands of this whole matter, and give the United States an out and out title without any conditions or servitudes or easements of sewerage, bridges, water rights, or any other rights inconsistent with the ownership we seek. It is said that would be some trouble. It would be. Taking the good faith of that honored Commonwealth, however, as her Senators say it is, and as I do not doubt, into account, I submit it would be a small matter for her Legislature to convene at the summons of the governor, and in one day put an end to all controversy:

and I submit that would be much more provident in us than to buy a lawsuit, as I fear we are to do, and perhaps an assortment of lawsuits, and an invitation as I think to one having been put in the bill by the amendment of the committee. That is my belief, Mr. President, and I declare it with just as earnest a purpose to reach the result sought as the most ardent Senator who advocates this bill.

Mr. HOWE. Understanding that the Senator has that earnest purpose to do what everybody else wants to do here, I will ask him what advice he would give us in this case: Suppose Kentucky will not do one of the things which he thinks she ought to do, what rights shall we have then?

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Wisconsin is I think unusually fertile this morning in hypothetical cases. He asked me once before what I would advise upon a different state of facts. I answer generally, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" and for men as sparingly endowed as I am, it is hard enough to say what they will do upon the facts before them, what they will do when the case presents itself; and when my honorable friend asks me what I would do in case Kentucky should undertake that of which I know she is incapable, namely, to get some unfair advantage of the United States or to play some trick upon us, I answer him that in that case I would do the best I could, and I would act upon the facts as they were at the time.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska resumes the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question, but I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Nebraska. I will give way to him.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to say that, as it is by his courtesy the floor was yielded, I do not wish to trespass further upon him; but if no other Senator desires to speak upon the Louisiana question at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, as it is now evident that this is a subject of importance which ought to be disposed of, I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not until to-morrow, because it may be late before the Senator from Nebraska concludes. I want to say something myself.

Mr. SCOTT. I only give notice. It will be for the Senate to act as it deems proper.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 15th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 241) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation, in Fremont County, Iowa; and

An act (S. No. 254) to donate the military reservation at Fort Steilacoom to the Territory of Washington for the use of the insane asylum.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 193) for the benefit of Uriah Porter.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2550) making appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2867) to authorize the use of certain unexpended balances for payment of expenses of board of Indian commissioners.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, it is a matter of delicacy on the part of a Senator to arise in the discussion of this question which has been so amply presented to the Senate by those who have been intimately connected with it; and consequently I feel that embarrassment at the present time. I apprehend that our minds are generally made up, and we will vote to-morrow about as we have settled the question up to the present time. It is evident to the Senate that there are so many adverse views as that it will be difficult to concentrate a majority of the Senate upon any one proposition.

I rise to address the Senate on this question at a time when the capitol of one of the States of this Union is besieged by State troops, while one citizen, fortified in the State-house with cannon planted around it, is besieged by another citizen who claims that he is the rightful governor of the State of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is a serious question for us to consider whether in saving the Union we have not lost the States. The eyes of the people seem to be turned to the Federal capital as though all power was concentrated in the Federal Government. But a short time since a man claiming to be governor of the State of Texas was calling upon the President of the United States for military aid and protection. Parties in the State of Arkansas are doing the same to-day.

A SAD CHAPTER.

In the investigation of a committee one year ago in the case of Louisiana, at the third session of the Forty-second Congress, a report was presented, signed by Messrs. CARPENTER, ANTHONY, LOGAN, and ALCORN, from which I read the following sentence:

> We now come to the saddest chapter in this melancholy business—the interference of Federal authority with the affairs of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. President, these gentlemen composing that senatorial committee were not hostile to the national Federal authorities. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin, the honorable Senator from Illinois, the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, at the time they presented that report were sensitive in regard to the honor of the "great republican" party of the nation; and when they penned such a sentence as that, when they presented that as a deliberate conclusion of theirs, the deduction of long days of careful research by witnesses under oath, they reluctantly made the report in which they declared it was the saddest chapter in a melancholy history. If such men so interested in the welfare of the dominant party were compelled to present that for our consideration, it becomes us to be careful in regard to the disposition which we make of this subject. But, Mr. President, to me it is a sadder consideration that it was not the first time in the history of this Administration that complaints came up to us from the State of Louisiana. The governor of Louisiana, in 1872, said in a message which he delivered to the Legislature of that State:

> I recite briefly the facts that are undenied as to this monstrous outrage on the peace and dignity of the State. In a time of profound peace, without any competent authority or the least necessity, and without consultation with or the consent of the State authorities, the United States officials here, in violation of law, convoked a political convention in the custom-house in New Orleans, and this against the wishes and in the face of the solemn protest of a large majority of the convention. The doors of the custom-house were locked and barred for a day, and the whole business public who had interests there were excluded. United States deputy marshals, selected in many instances from rough and lawless characters, were especially deputized for the occasion, armed with loaded revolvers, and stationed within the building and around the United States court-room, designed for the convention. The United States marshal previously declared that they should be stationed within the convention itself. Their instructions had been such that these deputies were insolent and violent in language and manner toward the delegates, even to such an extent as to excite serious disturbance, and going so far on the part of some of them as the offering of personal violence to the delegates.
> United States troops were drawn up in the custom-house. Their very presence was an alarming attack upon the right of public assemblage, and upon every tradition and principle of American liberty. They interrupted the deliberations of the delegates. This interference of Federal officers, armed with Federal authority and Federal guns and pistols, in the affairs of a peaceable political meeting of the people of a State, is a very serious encroachment upon the peace and dignity of the State, and upon the individual liberties of its citizens.

CHARACTER OF THE ELECTION.

Notwithstanding Federal officials had used Government bayonets before in furtherance of their designs, it seems unaccountable that they should have dared the experiment again, in the face of all the facts as set forth by their political organ, the New Orleans Republican, testified to and recorded in the book of testimony in this case, on page 274. I read from the Republican of New Orleans, dated the 19th of November, 1872, just at the termination of the election which has been a matter of so much discussion in the United States, and I wish every Senator was present to hear this. Although all have heard so much on the subject, and have heard it in the testimony, I should like an opportunity to call their attention to it once more before a final vote is taken on any bill that is before the Senate.

The editor says:

> In our testimony we have so recently reviewed the positions of the parties contending for the control of the public affairs of the State, that it is unnecessary to comment further at this time. But as it is rumored that the President is preparing his message with the most kindly sentiments toward the southern people, we deem it a duty to add the testimony of the Republican as impressing those sentiments more strongly upon him. This testimony cannot but from our stand-point be accepted as impartial. The Republican then assures the President—

The editor of that paper was addressing the President in person; he intended these remarks to be read by the President, and he says:

> The Republican then assures the President that no people were ever more orderly and obedient to law than the people of New Orleans and Louisiana in the State and Federal elections recently held; that the relations between the races are kindly and cordial, the colored people voting by the side of the whites openly without military protection, State or Federal, and free from any insult or molestation whatever.

The editor made that declaration, he says, for the President, because the President was getting up a message with kindly feeling toward the people of the South. He said that "no people were ever more orderly and obedient to law than the people of New Orleans and Louisiana in the State and Federal elections recently held." Had there ever been an election in Massachusetts? No more order had been displayed there than had been in Louisiana. Did he know anything of elections in the State of New York? He excepted nothing, but declared that there never were more orderly elections than that election of which we have heard so much in regard to its overshadowing corruption! Further:

> Difficulties which have arisen since the elections are simply official, and are not alleged to have sprung from force or fraud of the people. The controversy now pending has not arisen from the casting of the vote, but from the counting of the vote. This indication of order and harmony is not only proper for Executive consideration—

He draws the attention of the President again to it—> but to counteract, so far as may be, the slander that New Orleans is under control of lawless mobs. This slander has not only prejudiced the mind of Congress, but has impeded immigration and excluded capital. Whatever, then, may be the result of legal or political questions growing out of the Louisiana elections, the Republican deems it a duty to assure all whose opinion may have a bearing upon the political or commercial condition of New Orleans or Louisiana that the people, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, have demeaned themselves well and deserve well of the country for their conduct in the recent State and Federal elections.

It must be concluded that this article was specially brought to the attention of the President, for the writer says he publishes it to "impress those sentiments more strongly upon him." He deemed it as available as to write him a letter. This statement has stood as a republican rebuke in the way of any one who undertakes to say that there were unusual frauds in the election to which it refers. And yet while this was written on the 19th of November, 1872, the anxious candidate for governor of Louisiana only eight days later parades accounts of terrible frauds in order to influence the Administration to grant military aid, disregarding the editor's "impartial statement that the people, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, have demeaned themselves well and deserved well of the country for their conduct in the recent State and Federal elections." And when I refer to "the anxious candidate for governor" I refer to the present Governor Kellogg who, in playing his old role of conspiracy against the people of Louisiana, unwittingly drew his friends on this floor into such entanglement and trouble yesterday.

After that paper, the organ of Mr. Kellogg, gave that account of the condition of things in Louisiana, eight days thereafter Mr. Kellogg, then a Senator and against the constitution of Louisiana a candidate for governor of that State, writes a long, elaborate letter to the President of the United States, and that (I shall give in a short time the document in which we have it) is transmitted to us by the President of the United States. He addresses the President through Attorney-General Williams. One remark before I commence the reading of the document.

CONSPIRATORS.

I think it will appear from the further discussion of the subject that while the election returns were in the hands of a return board, of which the liberal republican governor was a member; and while that officer had at his command the militia of the State, and all official power of the State government; and while the laws provided for inducting defrauded candidates into office, and the Legislature was the judge of the qualifications of its members, no set of disappointed candidates would have dared to array themselves against the power of the State, unless promised Federal aid, through the intercession of Federal officials.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] in his speech of the 14th, said:

It appears, then, that the McEnery party had the purpose to cheat, and had the organized machinery to effect their end.

I propose now to strike out the word "McEnery" and substitute "Kellogg." I propose to show to the Senate "that the Kellogg party had the purpose to cheat and had the organized machinery to effect their end." When this handful of men commenced to get up their conspiracy, what power had they? Who were they? When they commenced the work of overthrowing the State government they had no election returns. In the State of Louisiana in olden times, before these days of degeneracy, it was supposed important to have some election returns before you counted and swore officers in the official positions of the State, and I think it was so in former days in all the States of the Union; but these gentlemen, these unadulterated and pure patriots, had no election returns, and it cannot be said of them that "still they were not happy." They were happy. What were election returns worth to them, for they had conceived the idea of manufacturing returns to suit themselves? Election returns, forsooth, in Louisiana! They had no governor to call upon either the powers of earth or the powers of perdition to send them aid, but they had enough of the latter without calling for it. [Laughter.] They had no Legislature; they were mere political lazzaroni. They had no State officer to correspond with the President of the United States; they had one Senator, formerly a district judge in the State of Nebraska, and then an emigrant to the State of Louisiana; they had one collector of customs; they had one marshal. The Senator was still occupying a position as Senator of the United States; the collector was a devoted friend of the Administration and a brother-in-law of the President, and, as the President has but one brother-in-law, every man understands that this man was Collector Casey. The marshal was ever ready to pay for his position by abject submission to the commands of his political masters.

These were the few lonely men who stood forth for the purpose of engineering the stealing of a State. Never were a set of men more happily endowed for the mission on which they went out, for what they could not appropriate is not worth being sought for, [laughter,] as a State is the very smallest that they are willing to receive.

Now, Mr. President, I shall have to deal in a little dry detail in regard to some testimony that I think has been presented once or twice in the Senate, and I regret that it becomes my unpleasant duty to inflict this testimony again on the Senator from Indiana, for he has heard of it twice; and I am happy to believe that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has betaken himself to parts unknown to me so that he, as my friend, will not have to suffer under the infliction of this testimony at this hour. I have come to the conclusion, whether properly or not, that there is a difference of opinion on this question between the honorable Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. I have inferred as much from what they have said to each other on this floor.

CONSPIRACY.

But enough of that, Mr. President. Now, if any gentleman is at a loss to know what use I propose to make of this testimony, I will say that I do not propose to make much use of it. I propose to let it exercise and produce its legitimate results itself. It is enough for me to state it. I believe there was a conspiracy about the custom-house; I believe custom-house officials were in it; I believe that citizens of Louisiana, of course politicians, were in it; I believe they were sustained and backed up by the Administration at Washington. I do not merely believe it; I know it; and will prove it before the Senate. They were one and the same; they were indivisible.

Speaking of men about the custom-house at New Orleans, a witness before the Senate committee said:

Previous to the election they said it made no difference how the State went; that they would get up affidavits after the election to carry the State.

He says again:

I suppose I heard twenty or thirty say it.

That testimony is found on page 530. Of the character of the elections in the State, a witness said, on page 712:

They have been pretty rough; we have been constantly urged from Washington to carry the State republican, and may have been misled into some little exertions that would not have taken place otherwise.

Now, as politicians, we will throw the mantle of charity over those gentlemen. No doubt they did perform some little exertions that would not otherwise have been made because they were "urged from Washington to carry the State republican." The 28th page of the Carpenter report says:

It was testified before your committee by Mr. Bovee himself, who participated in the canvass by the Lynch board, that they were determined to have a republican Legislature, and made their canvass to that end.

Senators, that is all there is in the question. It is all there is in the Louisiana difficulty. They were urged from Washington to do it, and therefore exerted themselves a little differently from what they would have done if they had been let alone; and then having resolved and sworn and intended to carry the State republican, if there was war, it was war to carry the State republican; if a State was overthrown, it was for the purpose of a republican triumph. Ordinarily we should think that a State would go down in this country on account of an invasion; we should suppose that a State would be in danger on account of a special insurrection; but here is a movement sworn to and declared to be for the purpose of carrying a State government. Well, who co-operated in this plot? "Prominent gentlemen from Washington," says a witness; but they did not wait for their affidavits until after the election.

PERJURY AND FORGERY.

Question. Were those affidavits printed before the election was held?
Answer. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I beg to ask where is the testimony he is quoting now. I have been able to follow him so far; but what is he reading from now?

Mr. TIPTON. I presume I am quoting from the testimony of Jaques. I have a reference to it in my notes, and I will give it on a short time. I think this is the testimony of Jaques.

Q. Were those affidavits printed before the election was held?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Reciting that these men had not been permitted to vote?
A. Yes, sir. Ten or fifteen days before the election I took over 1,000 to the parish of Plaquemines myself; about 2,000 on the 30th of October.

Being thus prepared to overthrow the election by affidavits, they sent out an agent to fill up these blanks, (T. Jaques.)

Q. Do you swear that you signed the names of 1,000 men to 1,000 affidavits?
A. Yes, sir. I put 1,000 names to 1,000 affidavits.
Q. Without any authority from the men?
A. Yes, sir. For many of the men were men of straw.
Q. You think you signed the names of 150 actually existing living men to affidavits without any permission from these men?
A. Yes, sir. General SYPHER got the boat that took me out, and said it was all right; and he wanted at least 1,200.

Did any of you gentlemen with a knowledge of politics find a man in that position before, where he needed 1,200 votes to put him in a certain place and he goes to a party and says, "I will get a steamboat, I will pay the bill, if you will go, and try to make, if possible, 1,200 votes?"

He asked me how many names were on the registration books. I said there were 4,000. He said: "Can't you make 3,500 on that? The books ought to bear that. Make me as many as 1,200, and as many more as you can."

Why, Mr. President, did you ever hear such language as that applied to politics before? They had a system down there; they knew what percentage of rascality ought to be perpetrated on a certain basis of voting named. "Can't you forge me 3,500." No; he did not say "forge;" he put it in better terms. "Can't you make 3,500 on that? The books ought to bear it. Make me as many as 1,200, and as many more as you can." Then the witness is asked further:

By Mr. WARMOTH:

Q. How many voters are there in Plaquemines?
A. Between 2,000 and 2,200.

Q. How many votes were polled at the polls?
A. Fifteen hundred, about.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Q. You say the whole vote is between 2,000 and what?
A. Between 2,000 and 2,200.
Q. And 1,500 were cast?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you made out 1,400 affidavits of men in the parish, showing they had not voted?
A. Yes, sir; 1,314.

They had all voted but about 600, and out of those 600 he manufactured 1,314 votes!

The registration books show about 4,000 names of the people in the parish, but people come and go, and that was in 1868. In 1868 and 1870, by the registration, there were three sets of registrars, and a good many were put on to increase the vote. That congressional district is democratic, and that was to be overcome.

Mr. President, I had better repeat that; I apprehend some Senators have not heard it. The witness swears that this congressional district was democratic and that had to be overcome, and therefore making 1,314 votes out of 600 would help a little to overcome it!

Q. In what year were they put on?
A. In 1868.
Q. Were you registrar then?
A. There were three sets of registrars, and they were put on by different parties.
Q. Did you put any names on the registration that you knew were not honestly there?
A. Yes, sir; many.
Q. How many?
A. I don't know.
Q. How many do you think?
A. I don't know; I put on over 50.
Q. Not over 50 of men who you knew had no business on the list?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. WARMOTH:

Q. You say it was a democratic district?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Why did you put those names there?
A. To elect General SYPHER to Congress.

Mr. President, speaking of a letter from a brother of General SYPHER, he gave the following account of it: He had been sent out for the purpose of manufacturing votes; then they got anxious, he did not return, and they were afraid he had burdened himself down with more votes than he was able to carry, and they were anxious to get so many of them as would answer their purposes. A brother of General SYPHER therefore wrote him a note when they were about to count, and he says:

Fetch down all the affidavits you get by seven o'clock, as the general is 400 short. (Page 527.)

Q. How many did you take?
A. Thirteen hundred and fourteen.
Q. Did you hand these affidavits to the board?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. To what member of the board?
A. I think Mr. Bovee or Mr. Lynch.
Q. What did Mr. Bovee say to you when you handed him these affidavits?
A. "Jaques, you are a hell of a fellow."
Q. What did you reply?
A. "George, if you want a few more, I can get you some by ten o'clock in the morning."

This witness said: "I am a republican, have been, and am in principle." You see some little inkling in regard to his "principle." [Laughter.] I deny in behalf of the republican party, the majority of it, that this man swore the truth when he said he was a republican in principle. I cannot come to that conclusion, that I was so long associated with such a brotherhood denominated by us all "the great republican party," and yet this man was one "in principle." He only represents the minority of the republican party, and how far the majority outnumbers the minority I know not; but I will aver that it is by one or two in the majority.

Q. What induced you to make a false report?
A. Nothing, sir, but the general sympathy I had for the party. (Page 565.)

That was all. A question being asked him as to the facts about the following attestation:

Sworn to before me by said —— and by him subscribed in my presence this —— day of ——, A. D. 1872.

WILLIAM M. PRESCOTT.

The witness answered that he took about 2,000 affidavits signed by the judge in blank.

Q. Signed in your house in New Orleans?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Twenty miles from Plaquemines?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. All signed in one night?
A. No, sir; he was there two or three days signing.
Q. How many did Judge Prescott give you that he signed in blank?
A. About 2,000.

About 2,000 affidavits manufactured in the garret or some other appropriate place in this man's house by a judge, signed as though the witnesses had been there, signed in blank; 2,000 of them carried out to find names to be inserted in them.

Q. Then you filled them up without having seen anybody?
A. Nobody, except the 301 I told you about.
Q. You filled up the 1,314.
A. Yes, sir. (Page 536.)

Now, Mr. President, in the process and the line of this conspiracy there is the manner in which some of the votes, and affidavits counted as votes, were manufactured. Of other portions of the testimony the committee's report will testify. Having by such means manufactured a large portion of their material for a republican count, the next thing was to get clear of the Warmoth board, which was charged by law with counting and publishing the result of the election. This was attempted by procuring a restraining injunction from a United States court, which had no shadow of authority in the premises, and of which order even the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has said "it had no foundation in law or logic."

But in the logic of infamy the application to that tribunal had a peculiar significance, since its presiding genius owed his political and official existence to him of the White House.

But on the 3d of December the Warmoth return board proclaimed the result of the election, and the governor ordered the Legislature to convene in six days thereafter—on the 9th of December, 1872.

APPEAL TO PRESIDENT.

In this hour of their consternation the Federal officials in Louisiana send greeting to the Government officials in Washington, and could not have expressed themselves more truthfully and persuasively had they adopted such a preamble and resolution as follows: "Whereas we have been constantly urged from Washington to carry the State republican, and to that end are ready to redeem our pledges that we would get up affidavits to carry the State; and whereas up to the present we have been circumvented by the obstinacy of Governor Warmoth; and whereas we have no military to protect us, and no Legislature to make a demand upon Congress or the President until we manufacture one out of affidavits, newspaper reports, and verbal statements, and even had we the Legislature we are at the present destitute of a state of invasion or domestic violence on which to predicate the demand; therefore resolved, that the President be importuned in behalf of republican ascendency, in order that Mr. Kellogg may become governor, Antoine lieutenant-governor, Bovee police juror, Clinton auditor, and Pinchback United States Senator, to direct the marshal for Louisiana to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States court, we, the custom-house officers, agreeing to work out the balance of the political problem."

KELLOGG LETTER.

From a voluminous correspondence between Louisiana Federal officials and the President direct, and through his Attorney-General, it will more fully appear what arguments were potent in procuring the order to the United States marshal to enforce political orders and mandates not yet issued, and securing a recognition of the bogus legislature, the offspring of these political mandates.

Inasmuch as this correspondence has been furnished Congress by a call upon the President for access to his source of information and the testimony being the result of a thorough congressional investigation, no one need be in doubt as to facts and legitimate deductions.

It seems to have been a vitally important matter in the estimation of Kellogg that the President should understand how much backing he would have from the courts in this political war, and accordingly he says:

I ought to mention that the supreme court will next Monday pass upon the case of Bovee, ejected over a year ago from the office of secretary of state by Governor Warmoth, without any legal right or showing. They will reinstate him.

He then shows how through two "republicans" they will get possession of the Legislature; and then adds:

You will at once appreciate the full effect of this point.

Here is positive evidence that the conspirators were in collusion with the courts, and publishing their findings before the day of trial. I fortify myself in that assertion by quoting from the recently delivered speech of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. On the thirty-seventh page he says:

I understand that the supreme court of the State is in collusion with Kellogg, has already corruptly decided many cases in his favor, and will continue in the same course.

In the same letter, and for the same purpose and intent, in order to encourage the President to promise military aid to enforce Durell's mandates before they were issued, the charge is made that Governor Warmoth had called an extra session of the Legislature for the purpose of favoring the "democratic party;" and on that he based a call for arms—arms to protect himself because Warmoth is going to favor the democrats. The people of the States of this Government had not arrived at this knowledge before that if the governor by any kind of political legerdemain undertakes to favor a certain party, therefore the President ought to furnish his friends with troops for the purpose of resistance. He says also:

And to take measures to stamp out the last vestige of republicanism in the State.

This allusion was made for the purpose of appealing to the President's partisan instincts, and causing him to become deeply interested in the cause of the custom-house officials.

Instead of pointing out the day on which Durell would "decide against him" (Warmoth) and issue his "mandates," and on which their board would "show the republican State ticket elected" and a "republican majority in the Legislature," he was only able to refer to these coming facts by way of supposition, for they were not to happen till after a promise of military aid. They were all consummated, however, within nine days from the date of his letter. Hear him:

Should the United States circuit court, in passing upon the question of contempt of its orders by Governor Warmoth, which is carried along with the main case, decide against him, and should it further issue its mandates in aid of what we believe to be the right in the controversy, the following may result: Our returning board being held as the legal return board may make the returns required by law, which will show the republican State ticket elected and a republican majority in the Legislature.

Suppose they do that, what then? Then Kellogg tells the President that which warped the mind of the President. Then Kellogg says they will make a return "which will show a republican State ticket elected"—how did he know?—"and a republican majority in the Legislature." How did he know? And then, "when the Legislature convened by Governor Warmoth meets in extra session a conflict may ensue." I put it to any republican Senator on this floor to tell me what was the mental condition of Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, after he had presented to him through the Attorney-General that language, "If Durell should happen to decide in our favor; if he should happen to decide against Warmoth; if our returning board, being then recognized, should make returns, quietly, in confidence, let me whisper, it will show something good for you and me, you for President and me for governor of Louisiana"—a good thing; he would have said "a big thing on ice," only it does not freeze very often down in New Orleans. [Laughter.] "It will show a republican State ticket elected, and I, Kellogg, will be a part of that republican State ticket, and it will show a republican legislature;" and then allow me to interpolate; when I, as governor, have left the seat I occupied in the Senate, another man worthy of the honors of Louisiana—although I am not certain that Pinchback represents a genuine article of jewelry—then may Senator Pinchback stand where Senator Kellogg fell. That was the political coming result foreshadowed in that document to the President of the United States before the issuing of the Durell order. What does he say? If that thing happens "a conflict may ensue." He was not positive about it; and then he writes further: "It is impossible to state at this time to what extent there may be danger of collision."

They might have a little fight; he thought they would want the Army of the United States there, because he said they were going to get up a republican ticket and a republican legislature, and there might be a little trouble; and then he says, President, it is impossible to state at this time to what extent the thing will rage, although there may be a conflict. But on such a showing as this the President, through the Attorney-General, issues the following order:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts—

They had not any then; they had some in anticipation—

no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

WHY GENERAL EMORY WAS WANTED.

It had been previously shown to the Administration at Washington that General Emory was likely to be a very efficient ally of the custom-house conspirators.

In the letter dated the 27th of November, 1872, and presented to the House of Representatives and recorded in the document which I hold in my hand, and which we all have, Governor Kellogg said to the President, addressing him through Attorney-General Williams:

I respectfully suggest that General Emory, who I think appreciates the necessity and sympathizes with the republican party here, be instructed to comply with any requisition that the United States courts may make upon him in support of its mandates and to preserve the peace.

It was not therefore a general who enforced law regardless of politics that the conspirators wanted, but one who was so identified with them as to make the Army of the United States an aid to the republican party of Louisiana.

I put it to any Senator and to every Senator that, if these men felt that their State was about to be invaded and they under the Constitution were entitled to protection from the Federal Government, they would have called upon the President for military protection, "Send us the Army." They never would have thought of the general who should command it. Any true officer of the United States Government will answer; any man, whether he be democrat, liberal republican, or radical republican, will answer if ever he exposed his life on the tented field, if ever he led the charge in the deadly onset. We are not here in Louisiana to ask of his politics. The Army; the Army—

"A horse! a horse! My kingdom for a horse!"

No, no; but they remember that they wanted a peculiar commander, and this man says to the President, "Emory sympathizes with the republican party here. Send him to us!" Do you say it was not a political contest, and the President was not arrayed upon the side of a party in the State of Louisiana? O, no; simply it was enough for him to know that God in his mercy and kindness had vouchsafed to the country a judge denominated Durell, and if it ever came to his knowledge officially that that immaculate personification of all judicial wisdom had delivered a legal utterance, it was his duty as the servant of the people and of the country, reluctantly, perhaps, but nevertheless his duty, to enforce the Durell mandate; and such is the opinion of the honorable Senator from New Jersey who addressed you the other day. He said it was a duty; he did not need to know anything about Durell. Now they let him into everything; they gave him the necessary information by Kellogg's correspondence, but he did not need to know anything about it. Kellogg told the President, He is all right; he sympathizes with us; give him an army to come down here and protect his brethren.

DELICACY.

Now, if Kellogg had one particle of public decency in his composition, if he was the descendant of some man or some men that hundreds of years ago had been men of honor, if he had descended from such a stock as that, he ought to have had some compunctions about what he was doing. He had some feeling on the subject. It is evident that the Senator felt the audacity of the demand, for in this connection we have the following:

I can readily understand the delicacy of the President's position in this matter.

Ah! There it is the worst of all. As much as to say, "Attorney-General Williams, I can speak freely with you in regard to this matter between the State of Louisiana and the President of the United States. I want an army very badly; I want an army, and I have suggested that Emory would be a proper man to lead the army. I feel a little humiliation that I am compelled to press this thing on the President, for I know the delicacy of the President's position in this matter." I say if the President of the United States had nothing to do, if the President of the United States was doing nothing but sustaining the Constitution and the laws, it was no matter of delicacy with him at all. An honorable, high-minded President delicate in doing his duty to save the integrity of a State! Not so much as formerly. But he says, "There is some reason why there is a delicacy in the President doing that which I want him to do." What did he mean? I do not know exactly what he did mean. Perhaps it might look as though the President was very anxious about the condition of Louisiana because Louisiana might elect electors that might give the casting vote and say who should be the next President. Perhaps it might be indelicate for the President to help to manufacture a Legislature that was to return a partisan friend to the Senate. Perhaps that was what he meant. He meant something that was founded in wisdom. He never trifles with his friends when he sends dispatches. He is a man of great prudence and wonderful discretion, of an unbounded devotion to truth, honor, and political justice! He understood there was something between him and the White House! But here comes the saving clause:

But it must not be forgotten that there is a systematic and organized attempt to destroy the republican party in this State.

Now we have got it. Now we will read all this in connection; we will read it as amended:

"I can readily understand the delicacy of the President's position in this matter; but it must not be forgotten that this is a systematic and organized attempt to destroy the republican party in this State."

Ay, ay, Mr. President; while you will feel delicacy in granting our request under the political circumstances that surround it, remember that above all, towering high above the interests of the State, above the rights of the State, above the Constitution and all, remember there is an effort down here to destroy the republican party, and then, where will you and I be?

That Kellogg letter is an interesting document. If it were not so near the end of the week, it might afford you food for reflection for three days; but Sunday intervening, of course the Capital will require you to divest yourselves of these political thoughts, and you have but one day now to meditate upon it (Saturday) until we get a vote, I trust, on Monday. It is good reading, though, and I am not quite done with it yet.

ARMY TO SAVE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Some extravagant gentleman will suppose that I, because he is extravagant, have been extravagant myself, and he will feel that I have been misrepresenting the intentions and actions of these men; but that I have not, I read verbatim et literatim the conclusion of this remarkable letter of Kellogg to the President of the United States:

In conclusion let me say—

Mind you, when Kellogg wrote this letter and wrote that conclusion he was not a governor of any State; the votes had not been counted out, and then he never had a vote counted for him anyhow that anybody ever cast, for his board never had any ballots to count. He wrote this as a private citizen, and being a Senator he hoped for something different and something better. I have no doubt he had become utterly tired of the Senate of the United States and he wanted to get into an association higher, purer, holier!

In conclusion, let me say that should the United States courts hold with us, and if I can count—

I! Who? Citizen Kellogg—

If I can count upon the co-operation and sympathy of the Federal Government—

Who are you that you are entitled to the support of the Federal Government?

If I can count upon the co-operation and sympathy of the Federal Government—

How far? Must he have two armies? Will one answer? "I will be specific." How far?

If I can count upon the co-operation and sympathy of the Federal Government, as far as it can be consistently given in aid of its firm and devoted friends in this

State, who have done all they could to carry the State, and have really carried it by a large majority against organized fraud, the State may be saved to the republican party for the future; and I believe that under its auspices the State will become peaceful and prosperous, and no longer be a standing disgrace to the party and the people at large.

That is the conclusion of that document. The Administration was thoroughly warned that there was such a necessity for an army. How much? Kellogg says there would be just this much, as much "as can be consistently given in aid of its firm and devoted friends in this State, who have done all they could to carry the State"—republican. And now with great respect to the genius and ability of my friend from Rhode Island before me, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] I should like to see him upon a problem working out a solution of the question, How far under the Constitution of the United States can the President lend the power of the Army to his deserving friends who have done all they could to carry a State and think probably they have carried a State, and could have carried two just as well as one if they only had two men sent out to manufacture affidavits?

Mr. President, this being the last elaborate appeal to the Administration before the issuing of the order to Marshal Packard to enforce "decrees and mandates," and basing the claim for co-operation and sympathy on such purely political and partisan grounds, no man can doubt for a moment why the Attorney-General issued the order. It will at once be discovered that this order to Marshal Packard was well adapted to the purposes of a base conspiracy. This order was to give them military protection in case a conflict arose on account of a "decree or mandate" of a United States court, and in its results it was to be equal to such "co-operation and sympathy of the Federal Government, as far as it can be consistently given in aid of its firm and devoted friends in this State, who have done all they could to carry the State" in order that "the State may be saved to the republican party for the future."

The Attorney-General should have replied thus: "While we do sympathize with you as our devoted friends and would willingly contribute money to aid you politically, and would send members of the Cabinet to stump your State, as we have done in other cases, (as in North Carolina we sent the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Interior,) to the end that 'the State may be saved to the republican party for the future,' yet the Constitution and laws do not provide for such cases, nor do the people support an Army at millions of annual expense for the use of an Administration's friends, even after they have 'done all they could to carry a State.'" They should have answered: "We must judge of the necessity and propriety of the case after we see the anticipated 'mandate,' for unless the 'jurisdiction' is unquestioned, we dare not violate all the usages of the Government from the days of Washington to the present time." That ought to have been the modest and delicate answer of the Attorney-General after all that correspondence between him and the contemplated governor of Louisiana.

TOO LATE.

Just at this juncture of affairs, I could wish that the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] had been present to meet the conspirators with the language of his report in the Louisiana case. He said in that report:

Where, by the constitution and laws of a State, legal remedies are provided for the redress of all wrongs that may take place in regard to elections, it would be inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the State governments for the United States to interfere and assume jurisdiction upon the ground that the State tribunals have acted wrongfully and fraudulently, or will so act. The Government of the United States is not a Don Quixote, going forth to hunt up and redress all the wrongs that may be inflicted upon the people in any part of the country; but is a government limited and restrained in its jurisdiction by the charter of its creation, and that charter distinctly recognizes the existence of State governments to be constituted legally by the States themselves, subject only to the provision of the higher law that they shall be republican in form.

I subscribe to that doctrine heartily; but unfortunately this State-right gun was spiked, till Federal bayonets had placed the conspirators in power, and then was turned against the prostrate government of Louisiana. If the honorable Senator from Indiana had been where he could have had the ears of these men when they were calling for this aid, he ought to have resisted them in their attempt. I could wish that the honorable Senator had met the President when he might have given him some gloriously good advice about that time. If he had met him with the "deliberate judgment" of his report before the commission of a Don Quixote was delivered to the Government of the United States, he might have saved the national disgrace and the State's destruction. Hear him:

It is my deliberate judgment that it is better for them to bear the ills they have and seek reformation and relief under their own laws and tribunals than to invoke the national Government to the assertion of a power under which State governments would exist hereafter only by sufferance.

But, unfortunately its fire was drawn from the conspirators and turned upon the subjugated State. In the first hour of complaint on the part of the conspirators they should have been answered by the President in the clear and conclusive declaration of the honorable Senator:

Every offense complained of on either side in this case was against the constitution and laws of Louisiana, and the question now presented broadly is whether the Congress of the United States shall interfere to correct violations of the laws of the State, and to redress wrongs for which redress is provided by the State tribunals.

Yielding to such wholesome doctrines, the President should have left the whole case with the "State tribunals." Now, however, since the State has been counted in republican, it suits them to leave the matter with the counted-in "State tribunal."

The honorable Senator from New Jersey also becomes very careful of State rights after a faction has borrowed an army and stolen a State. Hear him:

No, sir; better far let the States suffer for their own misdeeds, even the innocent with the guilty; their suffering will lead them to cure the evil. Admonished by the evil results of a vicious election, in the calm periods that intervene between elections all parties will unite in devising and adopting safeguards to secure honest elections. Registry laws, poll-lists, proper places for the polls, police regulations, and severely penal statutes will be adopted as the means of preventing the repetition of the evil. If there are frauds in elections or usurpations in office, let the remedy be found in the courts of the States or by means of impeachment, or by the frequently recurring popular elections.

So we told these conspirators that if they were deceived, if they were outraged in their rights, go to the courts of your State, go to the Legislature of your State. If there is a tie between your candidates for governor, your Legislature may settle it; but never approach the power of the United States Government for such a purpose.

WORKS OF DARKNESS.

On the 16th of November, 1872, the usurping board of the defeated candidates and Federal office-holders obtained from the eighth district court a restraining order against the legal board, and on the 7th of December declared their result.

The way had been prepared for them by the Federal troops. R. H. Jackson, a captain in the First Artillery, United States Army, testified that he went to New Orleans on the night of December 5 with two batteries of his regiment and eighty-six men.

The same night, December 5, between nine and eleven o'clock, Judge Durell, at his private lodgings, issued his order, which, for want of jurisdiction, was void, and entitled to no respect from anybody, directing the United States marshal forthwith to take possession of the State-house, to hold the same until the further order of the court, and prevent all unlawful assemblage of persons therein, having reference to the persons returned as elected to the Legislature according to the official returns. Captain Jackson testifies that he took possession of the State-house at about two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, with instructions to take and hold it under the direction of the United States marshal, and to act in obedience to his orders. He further testified that he was not stationed in the State-house to prevent riots, but to hold the building, and that if a riot had occurred in front of the building he would not have interfered. He posted two soldiers at the entrance door, who guarded it with crossed bayonets, and suffered no one to enter the building except by permission of the United States marshal, one of whose deputies was at all times present. These troops continued to occupy the State-house for more than six weeks, until January 21, and it is manifest, from the whole testimony, that they were not there to preserve the peace, but to carry out the illegal orders of Judge Durell, and prevent the legally elected members of the Legislature from assembling and organizing.

These Durell orders were never intended to be mere legal decisions, or mere expositions of constitutional law, but were to be individual contributions to a general political corruption fund for party purposes only.

Stripped of all judicial dignity, and revealed in their true character, they show a partnership in the work of conspiracy. Let the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] bear testimony:

I have had this injunction read so that the Senate may see that it justifies all I have said about it. It was a double-faced document; it was an injunction against the democrats, it was a mandamus in favor of the republicans; to the democrats a sword, to the republicans a shield. All that a republican partisan could decently have asked, even from such a judge, in organizing that Legislature, was that he should enjoin the democrats from going in, and leave the republicans at liberty to go in or stay out as they pleased. But having his hand in, he was determined to do thorough work, and by his injunction he kept the democrats out, and by his mandamus he put the republicans in.

CHARACTER OF THEIR RETURN BOARD.

After having got the orders of Judge Durell, the next thing was to get a returning board that would be corrupt enough to count according to their manufactured returns. They must have a republican board, not an honorable republican board, but it must be a subservient republican board; it must be a republican board of mere politicians, every man of whom ought to be an expectant for an office, men who would work for them for work again; political lazzaroni were what they needed and they got them. First for the political character of their board:

Question. What was the political complexion of that board? What were General Longstreet's politics in your political division there?
Answer. I believe General Longstreet is a republican.
Q. What was Mr. Hawkins?
A. A republican.
Q. Mr. Bovee?
A. A republican.
Q. What were you?
A. A republican.
Q. You were all republicans?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What has been General Longstreet's position since that? Does he hold any office or was he a candidate at that time?
A. He was not a candidate at that time. I believe he holds a State office now.
Q. What is that office?
A. I believe he holds the office of levee commissioner, as it is called.
Q. Who appointed him?
A. The governor of the State.
Q. What governor?
A. My impression is that Governor Pinchback did; either Pinchback or Kellogg.
Q. Is Judge Hawkins holding any office?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What office?
A. Judge.
Q. Who appointed him?
A. I think Governor Pinchback.
Q. And Bovee, you think, holds a parish office of some kind?

A. I do not know. I think he was a candidate for a parish office.
Q. Does he hold no office now?
A. Not unless it be that office.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was he elected or not?
A. I think he was elected.
Q. Have you been appointed to any office?
A. No, sir.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Q. Not that you know of?
A. I am no officer.

By Mr. TRUMBULL:

Q. Has your son been appointed to an office since you acted?
A. My son was appointed, but declined it.
Q. Who appointed him?
A. Governor Pinchback.
Q. Did you demand possession of an office for your son?
A. A deputy appointed by my son did.
Q. Did you demand it?
A. No, sir.
Q. Was it done by your direction?
A. No, sir; I recommended the deputy for appointment.
Q. He demanded the office for your son.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who appointed your son?
A. Governor Pinchback.
Q. Then General Longstreet, and Mr. Hawkins, and your son have all been appointed to office by Governor Pinchback since the meeting of that board?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Has General Herron been appointed, too?
A. Yes, sir; I understand he has.
Q. To what office?
A. I understand he is register or recorder of mortgages.
Q. Who appointed him?
A. I do not know.
Q. Do you know when he was appointed?
A. No, sir; it was either Pinchback or Kellogg.
Q. Do you not know he was appointed before Kellogg came in?
A. I believe so.
Q. Then that entire board, with the exception of yourself, are now in office?
A. I suppose they are.

Since then I believe the honorable Senator from Wisconsin in his speech gave us the salary which each one of these gentlemen is drawing, or an approximation to it. This immaculate board that counted in Kellogg and his Legislature consisted of Longstreet, whose salary is supposed to be $5,000; Hawkins, $5,000; the office held by the son of Lynch, $12,000; Herron, ten to twenty-five thousand dollars. That is the manner in which after these gentlemen counted their candidates in they counted dollars into their own pockets and those of their friends. Who was Clinton that has been counted in as auditor of Louisiana? He was the sub-treasurer of the United States in New Orleans. Who was Antoine? Lieutenant-governor counted in; he was the collector at Shreveport. Who was Kellogg who has been counted in governor? He was a Senator of the United States. Who was Pinchback? He had been a candidate for Congress at large, and unless he could get into the acting governor's chair of Louisiana he could not issue pay and appointments to his friends who had counted him in. By his political ingenuity he got at the head of the senate of the State, acting lieutenant-governor, and was thus able to pay off the men who counted in the State officers of the present State government of Louisiana. Am I extravagant in this matter? I will tone down and read from the Carpenter report on page 28. What does that report say about these men and their canvass? It says:

1. The board has been abolished by the act of November 20.

2. The board was under valid and existing injunctions restraining it from acting at all, and an injunction in the Armstead case restraining it from making any canvass not based upon the official returns of the election.

3. Conceding the board was in existence, and had full authority to canvass the returns, it had no returns to canvass.

The returns from the parishes had been made, under the law of 1870, to the governor, and not one of them was before the Lynch board. * * *

The testimony abundantly establishes the fraudulent character of their canvass. In some cases they had what were supposed to be copies of the original returns, in other cases they had nothing but newspaper statements, and in other cases, where they had nothing whatever to act upon, they made an estimate based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the parish, of what the vote ought to have been. They also counted a large number of affidavits purporting to be sworn to by voters who had been wrongfully denied registration or the right to vote, many of which affidavits they must have known to be forgeries. It was testified by one witness that he forged over a thousand affidavits, and delivered them to the Lynch board, while it was in session. It is quite unnecessary to waste time in considering this part of the case; for no person can examine the testimony ever so cursorily without seeing that this pretended canvass had no semblance of integrity.

In coming to this conclusion the committee had such testimony before it as the following testimony from Mr. Lynch:

We took all the evidence we had before us, and our knowledge of the parishes and their political complexion, and we then decided.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Question. You estimated it, then, upon the basis of what you thought the vote ought to have been?

Answer. Yes, sir; that was just the fact, and I think on the whole we were pretty correct.

THE TRUE ISSUE.

The Administration at Washington were perfectly aware, all the time, of the true question at issue in Louisiana. This is clear from Casey's dispatch to the President on the 6th day of December. Mr. Casey then sent a dispatch to the President in this language:

Marshal Packard took possession of State-house this morning, at an early hour, with military posse, in obedience to a mandate of circuit court, to prevent illegal assemblage of persons under guise of authority of Warmoth's returning board, in violation of injunction of circuit court. Decree of court just rendered declares Warmoth's returning-board illegal, and orders the returns of the election to be forthwith placed before the legal board. This board will probably soon declare the result of the election of officers of State and Legislature, which will meet in State-house with protection of court. The decree was sweeping in its provisions, and if enforced will save the republican majority.

Now, right at this point, the President understands what Durell has done with his decision, and the President is told that it is sweeping in its character—

And if enforced will save the republican majority, and give Louisiana a republican legislature and State government, and check Warmoth in his usurpations. Warmoth's democratic supporters are becoming disgusted with him, and charging that his usurpations are ruining their cause.

Observe now, that having received military aid through Marshal Packard to enforced "decrees and mandates," and having informed the President through Brother-in-law Casey that the decree was "sweeping in its provisions, and if enforced would save the republican majority and give Louisiana a republican Legislature and State government," they again call upon the President on December 9, 1873, by Legislature just counted in, and by Governor Pinchback just counted in, for more military aid under the Constitution of the United States.

Now, I want Senators to recollect just the extent of the case at the point where I am. They had got military protection for Durell's order. By that order they did take possession of the State-house; by the military order they held the State-house; by the protection of the military under that order they drove in their political cattle, they counted in their political Legislature. They had them now corraled, and they intended that they should grind out a constitutional demand for more military from the Government of the United States, and they told the President that the Durell order was a good thing of its kind; that it was sweeping in its influence, if it was maintained; and then in the next breath they ask for a little more of the Army. I say therefore to the Senate that when General Grant afterward gave that additional power of the Army, he knew what it was for, that it was for securing and making fast and permanent all that was gained by the first military grant to the sustaining of Durell's orders. If he knew anything he knew that. They asked military aid through the Legislature; they thought that would be more powerful. I want this demand of the Legislature to go on the record. And I will first read the demand of the Legislature, and then read the letter of Governor Pinchback in transmitting that demand to the President of the United States. It is as follows:

QUIET VIOLENCE.

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

We have the honor to transmit to your excellency the following concurrent resolution of both houses of the General Assembly and to request an early reply:

"Whereas the General Assembly is now convened, in compliance with the call of the governor, and certain evil-disposed persons are reported to be forming combinations to disturb the public peace, defy the lawful authority, and the State is threatened with violence: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the President of the United States be requested to afford the protection guaranteed each State by the Constitution of the United States when threatened with domestic violence, and that the presiding officers of the General Assembly transmit this resolution immediately, by telegraph or otherwise, to the President of the United States.

"Adopted in General Assembly convened this 9th day of December, A. D. 1872."

"P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
"Lieutenant-Governor, and President of the Senate.
"CHAS. W. LOWELL,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives."

Which Pinchback accompanies with the following telegram:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

President GRANT:

Having taken the oath of office and being in possession of the gubernatorial office, it devolves upon me to urge the necessity of a favorable consideration of the request of the General Assembly as conveyed in the concurrent resolution of this day telegraphed to you requesting the protection of the United States Government. Be pleased to send the necessary orders to General Emory. This seems to me a necessary measure of precaution, although all is quiet here.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor of Louisiana.

It is here discovered that Pinchback, as president of the senate of Louisiana, certifies the above preamble and resolution asserting that "certain evil-disposed persons are reported" as having hostile intentions toward the State of Louisiana, and then as acting governor, on the same day, he sends those resolutions to the President of the United States, and says "all is quiet here." How does that look for honesty and fairness in legislative dealing with the Executive? He asks the President of the United States for the Army, and, when he transmits that demand to the President, says "all is quiet here." On that same 9th day of December Marshal Packard also sent a dispatch to the Attorney-General, and after calling upon the President for military aid Packard also closes up by saying "all is quiet here." It would be a reasonable presumption that the President would need a great pressure upon him before he would enter a State while the governor declared "all quiet." He would want to know about combinations too powerful for local law, and about invasions and domestic violence generally. So it is not astonishing that the demand of the Legislature was not answered for the long space of two days. The resolution was dated December 9, and on the 11th telegrams were showered upon the President all day long urging prompt action. I want to know whether those telegrams told the President anything that could justify him in sending the Army again to Louisiana? It is only necessary to examine a few of these appeals in order to fully appreciate the motives from which the demand was finally conceded.

THE MEMORIABLE 11TH OF DECEMBER.

The first telegram was received, I fancy, on the morning of December 11, for it was sent on that day:

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

President GRANT:

Parties interested in the success of the democratic party, particularly the New Orleans Times, are making desperate efforts to array the people against us. Old citizens are dragooned into an opposition they do not feel, and pressure is hourly growing; our members are poor and adversaries are rich, and offers are made that are difficult for them to withstand. There is danger that they will break our quorum. The delay in placing troops at disposal of Governor Pinchback, in accordance with joint resolution of Monday, is disheartening our friends and cheering our enemies. If requisition of Legislature is complied with all difficulty will be dissipated, the party saved, and everything go on smoothly. If this is done, the tide will be turned at once in our favor. The real underlying sentiment is with us, if it can but be encouraged; Governor Pinchback acting with great discretion, as is the Legislature, and they will so continue.

JAS. F. CASEY,
Collector.

This is, to say the least of it, a very precious political document. First, there is an urgent appeal for the Army, because of a "desperate effort to array the people against us." By "us" does he mean the President and himself? He signs the dispatch as "Casey, collector." He addresses the President officially and he signs himself officially, as though this was really an official matter; and I rather think he was right according to the practice of this Administration, that any political epistle for the purpose of carrying a State election is an official document. If we refers to themselves, then he wants the Army to protect them from democratic partisans. Does "us" refer to office-seekers? Then the United States officials are so identified with the revolutionists that they are one and the same, and all want protection against the people. "But there is danger that they will break our quorum." That means that our legislators are liable to bribery, and the Army is necessary to protect their purity. But the final argument is not forgotten. He says in that dispatch "the party will be saved." This dispatch on which we have been commenting was probably transmitted in the early part of the day, and subsequently on the same 11th of December Collector Casey sends another, as follows:

President GRANT:

Democratic members of Legislature taking their seats. Most, if not all, will do so in next few days. Important that you immediately recognize Governor Pinchback's legislature in some manner, either by instructing General Emory to comply with any requisition by Governor Pinchback, under joint resolution of Legislature of Monday, or otherwise. This would quiet matters much. I earnestly urge this and ask a reply.

JAMES F. CASEY.

Though the democracy of the morning were acting so badly, "attempting to array the people against us," before night they were being seated in the Legislature, which should have precluded the necessity of sending troops; but no; "immediately recognize Governor Pinchback's legislature," was the importunate demand. So, then, Governor Pinchback had a legislature, which had been so accustomed to being bought and sold, that it needed the protection of General Emory for fear it would yield to "the temptation of bribery and they would lose their quorum."

And strange as it may appear, on that same 11th day of December, 1872, Governor Pinchback sent a message calling for troops "for the protection of the Legislature and the gubernatorial office," and said that he thought "the moral effect would be great." What an exponent of morality, what a writer upon ethics, engaged in such a conspiracy as that, and telling the President he thought that the moral result would be immense!

Again, on that same 11th day of December, Governor Kellogg—the prudent Governor Kellogg—sends a message to the President. What does he say?

NEW ORLEANS, 11*th*, 1872.

Hon. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS:

If President in some way indicate recognition, Governor Pinchback and Legislature would settle everything. Our friends here acting discreetly.

W. P. KELLOGG.

That was very important. Trouble in Louisiana; men wanting to hold offices that some other gentlemen thought they never were elected to fill; some of them acting discreetly; all things quiet there, according to their dispatches; military aid very necessary, according to the demand of Kellogg!

Beckwith, the United States attorney, on the same day sent a dispatch to the Attorney-General. I thought this question had been political for some time, but now Beckwith utters the important piece of information to the President that the thing "is now political;" Army quick, forward, the occasion is now political. But these gentlemen are becoming very accommodating. How easily satisfied they are when great revolutions are abroad, when States are being rocked to their foundation by invasions, when great upheavals are taking place! When a vast government is threatened to topple over in one indiscriminate destruction men ask for armies, Federal arms, rifles, muskets, cannon! These gentlemen say, "Recognize us in some way;" but in Kellogg's letter of 27th of November he had it as far as it can be consistently given in aid of its firm and devoted friends who had done all they could to "carry the State." Casey says "in some manner," and then again says "in some manner, according to the Legislature or otherwise." Anything, Mr. President—the Army, in some manner, recognize us in some way or otherwise. I wish for the honor of the country the President had recognized them otherwise. It was all they ought to have had, an otherwise recognition. The President thought different; he sent the Army. Had they felt entitled to military aid they would have spoken in one set formulary; but here we have an indication of a desire, a wish for something—an army in some way or otherwise. Give us a recognition. We thought it was well enough to pass a resolution according to the Constitution and ask it through the Legislature, but we would be thankful for small favors—anything, Mr. President, or the democrats or liberal republicans will get the victory over us in Louisiana.

Now it is evident that the President did not believe their Legislature entitled to such aid under the Constitution, for he sent them a dispatch on this 11th day of December. Mark it, Casey sends in his first dispatch, his second dispatch; then the marshal sends a dispatch, then the district attorney sends a dispatch, and Governor Kellogg sends a dispatch, and then the President had to reply. What did he say? Here is what he told them on that day when the air was full of dispatches:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 11, 1872.

P. S. PINCHBACK—

O, no; the most of the alphabet—

P. B. S. PINCHBACK—

And the balance of the alphabet in parentheses—

Acting Governor of Louisiana:

Requisition of Legislature transmitted by you is received. Whenever it becomes necessary in the judgment of the President, the State will be protected from domestic violence.

G. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

On the evening of that 11th day of December, with all these demands, the President did not believe they had any business with an army on the showing they had made, and told them so. He says:

Whenever it becomes necessary in the judgment of the President, the State will be protected from domestic violence.

Mr. President, it is inferable after that day's labor with the dispatches that the President retired to rest about twelve o'clock, if Presidents ever retire as common citizens do. It may be an interesting investigation to enter into a calculation as to what his normal mental condition was at twelve o'clock on the 11th day of December, 1872, after having been belabored with these messages for political aid. Suffice it to say he enjoyed his wonted degree of repose. It is inferred that he rose on the morning of the 12th as was his custom, and while the President was contemplating the subject in the light of the dispatches of the 11th, on the 12th he received a dispatch from Casey which I desire to read. This is the final dispatch—the last grain that broke the back of the Federal camel:

NEW ORLEANS, December 12, 1872.

President GRANT:

The condition of affairs is this: The United States circuit court has decided which is the legal board of canvassers. Upon the basis of that decision a Legislature has been organized in strict conformity with the laws of the State, Warmoth impeached, and thus Pinchback, as provided by the constitution, became acting governor. The chief justice of the supreme court organized the senate into a court of impeachment, and Associate Justice Talliaferro administered oath to Governor Pinchback. The Legislature, fully organized, has proceeded in regular routine of business since Monday. Notwithstanding this, Warmoth has organized a pretended legislature, and it is proceeding with pretended legislation. A conflict between these two organizations may at any time occur. A conflict may occur at any hour, and in my opinion there is no safety for the legal government without the Federal troops are given in compliance with the requisition of the Legislature. The supreme court is known to be in sympathy with the republican State government. If a decided recognition of Governor Pinchback and the legal Legislature were made, in my judgment it would settle the whole matter. General Longstreet has been appointed by Governor Pinchback as adjutant-general of State militia.

JAMES F. CASEY.

This document comes then to the President on the morning of the 12th, after he becomes somewhat refreshed, and therefore it is an important document. From this the President discovered that the very thing had happened which was promised by Mr. Kellogg when he said: "Should the United States circuit court decide against Warmoth" the return board "will show the republican State ticket elected, and a republican majority in the Legislature," and that conveyed to him the gratifying intelligence that all was well, politically, so far as the result of the first aid that he gave them was concerned. Here, then, was the result of granting military aid to enforce the mandates of that court in advance. By this the President discovered that he had set up a legislature by military power. And now for two days he had been contemplating the demands of his legislature for further military aid, while the officer of the Legislature transmitting the call for the Army had kindly told him that all was quiet there. It was the safest place in the world to send an army where all was quiet. If he now grants the use of the Army further for the protection of a usurping governor and legislature, he does so with the distinct understanding that he has lent the power of the Government of the United States to enable a set of Government officials and their confederates, in Louisiana, to advance to positions under the State of Louisiana which could only be reached by mandates and military support.

But this dispatch of Casey of the 12th does not throw any new light upon the necessity of protecting the State.

True, it says "a conflict may ensue," but three days before this that same thing had been told him by two of his officials, who also conveyed the sad intelligence that "all is quiet here." So he had a right to infer that it was one of those quiet conflicts in which his brother-in-law and the truly courageous Kellogg were so eminently qualified to figure.

True, it said their Legislature was not safe without Federal bayonets, but to announce that was a work of supererogation; for the President must have known the constitution of Louisiana (article 59) made Governor Warmoth "commander-in-chief of the militia of the State," and article 65 said, "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and of course they were not safe. And if the President will only call away his troops, the legally elected governor of Louisiana will show the whole country that the Legislature is not safe; and yet it would only be a "quiet conflict," for they would follow the Federal Army, unless indeed their quorum had not previously been broken by bribery.

True, it said, "the supreme court is known to be in sympathy with the State government;" but had not Kellogg been sufficiently explicit when he said of that court before, "on next Monday they will reinstate Bovee?" So that was nothing new. The President knew that they could rely upon that State court.

Under these fast-accumulating dispatches the President seems to have forgotten the stand taken in his telegram of the day before, that he would be the judge of the "necessity;" and accordingly, before that telegram was twenty-four hours in New Orleans, in reply to these appeals for help, the Attorney-General answered, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 12, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK, New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State; and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

But this was unavoidable if the conspiracy was to be perpetuated and consummated.

Order No. 1 sustained Durell's United States mandates, and gave them a State-house and Legislature; but "still they were not happy;" and while much exercised about reports of evil-disposed persons—for all communities have such people—the President, to quiet their fears, invoked the aid of that invisible article of the Constitution, which he must have construed as follows:

"In the absence of invasion and domestic violence the President may grant such co-operation and sympathy of the Federal Government, as far as it can be consistently given, in aid of its firm and devoted friends who have done all they could to carry a State."

Thus order No. 2 became the natural complement of No. 1, drawing after them certain proclamations, messages, and apologies, all of which failed to whitewash this iniquity or commend it to the liberty-loving people of this country.

How appropriate just here for me to quote the language of our acting Vice-President, [Mr. CARPENTER,] from his great speech of January 30:

I say the State of Louisiana has been trodden beneath the foot of a Federal judge.

INSULT ADDED TO INJURY.

From the moment this second fatal order was issued the heart of the President became set as flint against the imploring people of Louisiana. Having refused the appeal of Governor Warmoth on the 11th of December, for on that day, when all these voluminous documents were as dispatches investigated by him, Warmoth telegraphed him thus:

A full statement of the facts will be laid before you and the Congress in a few days.

So he refused the mild and liberal request of McEnery, governor-elect, that neither party be recognized till the people's committee could reach Washington; while in the same intolerant spirit he insulted the committee of one hundred with the following dispatch:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN MCENERY, New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

It is a constitutional right of the people to petition Congress for redress of grievance; but here they are repulsed from the Executive presence, "his decision" being "made."

Having called the attention of Congress to Louisiana affairs and told his party friends that he would persist in recognizing the Pinchback government unless prevented by legislation, and they refusing to allow any relief, his faithful marshal, Packard, having caught the party spirit and felt the party pulse at Washington while the question was being agitated here last winter, sent this telegram to his New Orleans deputy:

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1873.

T. W. DEKLYNE, Deputy United States Marshal:

Tell Kellogg to keep his shirt on. His talk of a compromise only irritates authorities. The only compromise is for members elected to go in and take their seats in the Legislature, and that excludes all contest. The McEnery government must be broken up as soon as Congress adjourns.

S. B. PACKARD.

I want to call the attention of Senators to this document in one single direction:

His talk of a compromise only irritates authorities.

I thought the authorities at Washington were in favor of a compromise, in order that the people of Louisiana might have settled this question according to their own desire; but this man here among the authorities, and amenable to the authorities, says that this talk about a compromise irritates the authorities. The authorities were so well satisfied with having the State of Louisiana under their feet and with the bayonets of the Government at their throats, that they did not want any compromise at all. Therefore, he says, "Tell Kellogg to keep his shirt on. His talk of a compromise only irritates authorities." It seems that Kellogg then was thinking of a compromise.

How far the marshal's threat was carried out let the Senator from Wisconsin answer; and I quote him as being the only authority that I have on the subject:

Congress adjourned on the 4th of March. It had been telegraphed from Washington that the McEnery government must be broken up as soon as Congress should adjourn. Kellogg sent his metropolitan police—a military brigade, armed with Winchester rifles and led by Brigadier-General Badger—backed by United States troops within call, and the McEnery legislature was dispersed by force. Members of the senate and members of the house were arrested. McEnery escaped through a back window. That was what was done by Kellogg in obedience to this command from Packard to break up the McEnery government as soon as Congress adjourned.

May 23, 1873, the President issued a proclamation in aid of Kellogg's government, of which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] has published the following:

I say it was issued without any authority of law. There was no case made before the President which authorized him to interfere. Nothing was shown to him establishing the fact that there was an insurrection in that State against the government of the State. The case made is "domestic violence." The President does not know anything about domestic violence. That is not a call that brings him to his feet. That might bring Congress into action; there might simply be a riot there, or other disturbance, not directed against the State government, and under the power which the Constitution confers upon us perhaps we could order the Army there to suppress it. I do not say whether we could or could not, but I do say that the President could not. He must have a case not of domestic violence, but a case of insurrection in a State against the government thereof; and I say no such case was shown. Therefore I say there was no authority for issuing that proclamation.

The manner of calling for aid on the 13th of May, 1873, shows the loose and crude ideas of Governor Kellogg in regard to constitutional rights, and the fact that it was granted shows the willing compliance with a mere political demand.

Was there invasion or such domestic violence as endangers the supremacy of a State? No, sir. Kellogg says:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, May 13, 1873.

SIR: Domestic violence existing in several parishes of this State which the State authorities are unable to suppress without great expense and danger of bloodshed, and the Legislature not being in session, and it being impossible to convene the Legislature in time to meet the emergency, I respectfully make application, under the fourth section of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, for a sufficient military force of the United States Government to enable the State authorities to suppress insurrection and domestic violence.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM P. KELLOGG,
Governor of Louisiana.

His Excellency U. S. GRANT,
President United States.

So then the Federal Army is brought forward for the purpose of saving States from great expense and bloodshed. This construction wipes out the States and concentrates everything in the General Government. I had supposed the States were to pay the expense and furnish the militia, and when overpowered a call was to be upon the Army of the Union. But here the Union Army is to lead the charge, and when defeated receive the aid of the State militia if it can be given without "great expense and bloodshed." According to the honorable Senator from New Jersey the case was never made; for he says:

This provision of the Constitution contemplates a sudden emergency when violence has subjected and trampled down the law.

THE REMEDY.

From this showing, then, I protest against seating as a Senator any man coming here with credentials from the Kellogg and Pinchback legislature, and I earnestly protest against the passage of any bill which, while it strikes down the fraudulent Kellogg government, also supersedes the government of McEnery and his associates. My remedy is this: Remove "the foot of the Federal judge," which has trodden down the State of Louisiana, and that government which has been held in abeyance by Federal troops will arise and assume its legitimate functions. To effect this I desire, first, to vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and in case of its failure I shall consider the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin with relation to relief for the people of Louisiana.

A PRECEDENT FATAL TO LIBERTY.

If this procedure is to be sustained by the Congress of the United States or is to pass unchallenged, then, becoming a precedent, my own constituents may become victims of a similar conspiracy whenever political audacity demands and a partisan Executive orders.

After an election in Nebraska it shall only be necessary for such candidates as suspect they are beaten to resolve that the returns which are in the possession of the governor and legal return board shall not be counted or successful candidates commissioned. Having no government behind them or army to sustain them, they shall look away from the courts of Nebraska and invoke the special aid of the "decrees and mandates," of United States courts and the protection of the Federal Army. The moment the aid is procured, then the question is settled against the people and State government, unless the State could levy successful war, overthrow the Army of the United States, and hurl the pestilent usurpers from place and power.

If one State has fallen in this manner another may, and by the general application of the precedent the ability to supplant every State government would depend entirely upon the amount of the United States troops, the facility with which they could be handled, and the limit set to the usurping spirit of a President.

Mr. BOGY obtained the floor.

Mr. BOREMAN. I suppose the Senator does not wish to speak at this hour; and if he will give way, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BOGY. I yield the floor for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BOREMAN. I submit the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 17, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CLERK AND STATIONERY FOR TERRITORIAL DELEGATES.

Mr. CHAFFEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the territorial Delegates as a committee be allowed the usual amount of stationery, and also a clerk, whose pay shall commence from the date of entering upon such service.

Mr. CHAFFEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF ALLUVIAL LANDS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MOREY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Select Committee on the Mississippi Levees a bill (H. R. No. 2988) to provide for the appointment of a commission of engineers to investigate and report a permanent plan for the redemption of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

RELIEF OF SUFFERING IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. MOREY also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 87) authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be issued Army rations, forage, and disused Army clothing to the suffering people in danger of starvation in the inundated region of the Mississippi River and its tributaries; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MOREY. I desire the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Education and Labor, and I ask that the committee may be authorized to report it back at any time. In connection with this matter I would like to make a statement of less than five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The request for leave to report at any time will be submitted after the gentleman's remarks. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, within the last twenty-four hours I have received several letters and telegrams, portraying in vivid language the great sufferings of the people of Louisiana, Mississippi, Lower Arkansas, and Tennessee, where the Mississippi River and its tributaries have swept over their farms and plantations and where many of them to-day have for their only refuge the levees, which are now a few feet above water. This distress is confined to no class of people. The colored laborer and the tenderly nurtured southern lady are alike suffering. Some of these people have taken refuge on barges moored to the levees. In this connection I ask the Clerk to read a letter from a correspondent of the New York World:

The Clerk read as follows:

At each flooded village along the river shore we heard some sad story of irreparable losses caused by the disastrous flood. Above Laconia, Arkansas, the river had risen an inch in twenty-four hours outside the levees, and two feet inside or behind these dikes. People at farm-houses along the banks were busy constructing boats and making bridges from house to house. Hogs, cattle, horses, sheep, goats, chickens, a yellow dog, and three little negroes were all peaceful occupants of the portico and galleries of a planter's peaceful domicile. Along the river, cows, hogs, and deer stood upon the levees and looked idly and curiously at the passing steamer. Domestic and wild animals alike are starving. Deer are killed in great numbers, but are emaciated and valueless. At Napoleon, at the mouth of the Arkansas, where a great Government hospital, undermined by the Mississippi, disappeared, there was only one narrow spot of dry land visible. The people gained access to it by means of canoes.

If the flood does not subside within a brief period, or if the annual rise of June, produced by melting snows in western mountains, be as great as in many former years, suffering in the lowlands will be wholly unprecedented. Merchants in villages along the river shore have closed their doors. The people have no money, and the flood which may render the production of a crop impossible destroys credit. Already negroes recognize the pangs of hunger, and hogs and cattle are stolen and destroyed. Want drives the people to kill famished deer that wander up and down the levees, and we may witness even here, on the shores of another Ganges, as terrible suffering as that which British philanthropy seeks to relieve in India.

Mr. MOREY. While Congress was not in session the President of the United States considered himself authorized to order the issue of rations to the suffering people of Chicago when that city was devastated by fire. He also considered himself authorized to order an issue of rations to the suffering people of Shreveport and Memphis during the prevalence of the yellow fever. But now that Congress is in session, he does not like to take the responsibility of ordering a similar issue to the suffering people of the South. The present inundation is more severe than any that has happened since the war. It has been equaled by none since 1847; and the people were never more destitute, never in a condition to need aid more than they do now. Unless there be some objection, I ask that the resolution be considered now.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must object to that. Let it be referred.

Mr. MOREY. Then I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, with permission to report at any time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish the gentleman would state as nearly as he can the number of persons affected by the existing distress.

Mr. MOREY. I cannot state definitely; but from the best information I have, the number of suffering people is ten or fifteen thousand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] asks that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must object to giving the committee authority to report at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this subject ought to be referred in the regular way to a committee.

Mr. MOREY. I ask that it be referred, and that the committee have leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] object?

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me it ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COX. I think this bill is a little outside of the scope of our legislation. Why do we not assist the forty thousand suffering and starving poor in the city of New York?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Education and Labor, but I do not think they ought to be authorized to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as objecting to the reference.

Mr. STORM. I suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana to refer it to the Military Committee. It seems to me that is the proper committee.

Mr. MOREY. I consent to that reference if there is no further objection, with the same authority given to the committee to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, with the right to report back at any time?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MOREY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called for, the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. HAWLEY,) who is in charge of private bills, whether he is not willing to let them go over to-day so we may go on with the legislative appropriation bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is exceedingly important we should get some appropriation bill before the Senate in order to give them something to do.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It is not my intention to press the consideration of private business in Committee of the Whole to-day or to-morrow, but we should have the morning hour to allow the committees to submit reports of private bills, so they may be referred and placed upon the Calendar, and the bills and reports ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that we may go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union immediately after the presentation of bills for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will consider the fact——

The SPEAKER. That is in fact calling for the morning hour. The gentleman from Ohio must insist on his motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union or withdraw it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will consider the fact that up to this period of the session there has been an extraordinary amount of time devoted to the consideration of private business. I must say the passage of that kind of bills has been unprecedented in our legislation, and I do not think we ought to take up so much time, some of which ought to be devoted to the consideration of public bills.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I wish to say that there has been less attention to the Private Calendar at this session than during any session since I have been here.

Mr. HOLMAN. The record is as I have stated it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It has been usual to give Fridays and Saturdays to the Private Calendar. I am not asking to go to the Private Calendar to-day, but simply asking that the morning hour shall be devoted to the reception of reports of a private nature from the committees, so they may be referred and placed upon the Private Calendar. I hope that will be conceded by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must correct the gentleman from Illinois on that point. In the ten years he has been in Congress he has never seen so much attention given to the Private Calendar as at this session.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does the Chair mean to state that more attention has been paid to the Private Calendar at this session than at any preceding one?

The SPEAKER. The Chair means distinctly to say that; more time, more hours, and more private bills. And the Chair means also to call attention, as he is chairman of the Committee on Rules, to the fact that as the rules now stand, if the House sits six days in the week, they compel us to give one-third of the time to private bills. Monday is a dies non in legislation; Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday are for public business, and Friday and Saturday for private bills. It is the judgment of the Chair, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, that the rules ought to be changed in this respect, as they give entirely too much time for private bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that matter will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. It is already before the committee and they have it under consideration. The gentleman from Indiana will observe that the call of the Private Calendar in the Committee of the Whole on the first and fourth Friday of each month, known as objection days, has given a greater opportunity for the passage of private bills of an unobjectionable nature than has occurred for the last dozen or fifteen years. In the judgment of the Chair the first and fourth Friday rigidly adhered to and given to private bills is as much as ought to be taken.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does the Chair announce to the House we have had nothing but private bills on objection days for the last four or five weeks? Does the Chair think we should have no other time devoted to the consideration of private bills except objection days?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the first and fourth Friday would be sufficient.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is the Chair of the opinion that we ought to have private bills considered only on days known as objection days when a single objection would prevent any bill passing? Now, it is well known that on objection days, one objection can prevent any bill being considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that one objection is only fatal on the first call; and after that first call is through the first and fourth days of the month may be devoted to the consideration of bills which have been passed over.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Yes; but after that five members objecting may prevent a bill passing.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then I do not understand the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not understand the rules if he thinks that is the way in which they operate.

As this is Friday, the Chair will detain the House a moment in order to make this plain. When the Calendar is called over the first time, and a bill is reached, one objection will lay it aside. Many gentlemen are under the impression that the rule was passed in order that a mere factious objection might obtain and prevent the passage of private bills. The object of the rule was just the reverse. It was to facilitate the passage of all bills that are unobjectionable. For instance, here is the Calendar with a hundred bills on it. The first four or five may be sharply debated, while the great bulk of the bills on the Calendar may be meritorious and unobjectionable. The object of the rule is simply that a bill, which may be debated at length, shall not stand in the way of a hearing of those bills to which there is no objection. When one objection is made the bill is laid aside, and in that way you get every bill passed to which nobody objects. On the second call, if five gentlemen object to a bill, it will be laid aside. But after the one objection, and after the five objections, the bills are then all subject to a majority vote, and must come to a majority vote, as well on objection days as on other days if the committee reaches them.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the Chair will permit me, I desire to say a word. The Chair is undoubtedly right, supposing that on objection day we could, in point of fact, get through the Calendar; but I have never known that to be done so long as I have been in the House, since the Calender has been made up under the operation of the present rule. It would seem, therefore, that it would be right to give some time for the discussion of the class of private claims which involve, not the facts of the particular claim, but the principle on which it rests. There are various such claims, and especially those known as the southern claims, which ought to be discussed and settled on a state of facts about which there is not much controversy.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to submit a modification of the suggestion of the Chair, which, it seems to me, would greatly facilitate business. Instead of adopting the suggestion of the Chair, suppose we pass this order, which can be reconsidered at any time:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, Saturday only shall be devoted to private bills.

Then we will have four consecutive days for general business. Assigning Saturday exclusively to private business will secure work on that day, and we will be able to dispose of private bills. Let this be only until otherwise ordered. Whenever the business of the House is such that either public business requires Saturday, or private business requires Friday also, we can pass another resolution. It seems to me that four consecutive days would contribute very largely to the discharge of the public business, and I suggest to the House to try that experiment for a little while.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the gentleman's proposition be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DAWES. I do not suggest that it be made a standing rule, but that it may be tried as an experiment until otherwise ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I would amend the gentleman's proposition by substituting Friday for Saturday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to say, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that if you take Friday and then turn Saturday over to public business, you break up the public business by one day intervening. It strikes me, from some little experience, that for the present we could try that experiment for promoting the public business. I will therefore move——

The SPEAKER. That could only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, unless it goes to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. Before the subject is left the Chair desires to make one remark. The rule specifically provides that the House may on any day go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; only Friday and Saturday must be devoted to private business in preference to any other.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule excludes anything else.

The SPEAKER. Decidedly so, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House. But the rule says:

Such bills may also be considered in their order on other days, notwithstanding their precedence on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does not that have reference to precedence in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The House may go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have stated to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that I have no objection to the House going into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill to-day or to-morrow; but I wish to remind the House that for two weeks we have not had a day devoted to private business; and if private business is thrown over till next Friday it will be three weeks. I do think that we ought to have a morning hour at least once in two or three weeks, in order to have the bills printed with the reports and placed on the Private Calendar.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on my motion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I submit that I ought to be recognized, or some other gentleman, on private-bill day for a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes that motion it takes precedence.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I make that motion.

Mr. CONGER. If the motion of the gentleman from Ohio be agreed to, will that deprive us of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Certainly it will.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not wish the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; I want the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Well; but the gentleman insisted on his motion taking precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. If he does not make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, then the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is in order, and he has a right to test the sense of the House upon it.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the appropriation bill, then will we have the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Of course, naturally.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion; and it was not agreed to—ayes 44, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour commences at twenty-six minutes past twelve o'clock, and the committees will be called for reports of a private nature.

MASSACHUSETTS MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, a bill (H. R. No. 2989) to authorize the trustees of the Massachusetts Museum of Fine Arts to import and retain for two years certain works of art free of duty.

The bill was read.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I make a point of order on that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; it is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman from Connecticut make?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. That the bill changes the customs laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that it is a revenue measure, and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAWES. It is a private bill. I do not know but that it must go to the Committee of the Whole; but it would be to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, for it is a bill for the benefit of a single institution.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. It is a private bill; but at the same time the point of order that it changes the revenue laws is a good point, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

Mr. DAWES. I have another bill to report from the Committee on Ways and Means, but I am not certain whether it is a private bill or not. It is a bill to remit the duties on certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in the city of Boston.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not that a public bill; a revenue measure?

Mr. CONGER. It is certainly not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a public bill, and that it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAWES. I am content that it shall go there if I may be permitted to report it now. I knew that it would have to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that there will be no objection to its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FIELD. I object to its being reported on this call. This is private bill day.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will allow the bill to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be returned to the gentleman from Massachusetts; he can report it after the morning hour for reference.

URIAH PORTER.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 193) for the benefit of Uriah Porter.

The bill was read. It authorizes Uriah Porter, of Allen County, Kentucky, to operate his distillery in the county and State aforesaid, without being required to procure the written consent of John H. Page, who holds a lien on the land and distillery of said Porter, provided that said Porter, prior to distilling, shall execute a bond to the United States, such as is prescribed by section 8 of the internal-revenue act, approved July 20, 1868, as amended, to be taken in lieu of the written consent of the owner of the fee. But nothing in the bill is to be construed as dispensing with any of the requirements of the law in this case, but that of the procuring of the consent aforesaid.

Mr. BECK. The only object of this bill is to allow a man, who cannot obtain the consent of the person who holds a lien upon the land, to give bonds as though he had built the distillery prior to the passage of the law of 1868.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question on this subject. A number of bills of this character have been brought before the House. Why do not the Committee on Ways and Means provide for some general legislation upon the subject, so that we may dispense with this legislation?

Mr. BECK. We have made the law pretty general, but we thought it was better to require the distiller in every case where it is possible to have an absolute title; and only where this is impossible do we make any exception.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BECK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. F. MOORE AND C. W. LEWIS.

Mr. WALDRON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2990) for the relief of Jesse F. Moore and Charles W. Lewis, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the following; which were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 2593) for the relief of Henry S. French, of Tennessee;

The petition of Gideon J. Pillow, for payment for mules taken in 1862;

The memorial of James and William White, of Hawkins County, Tennessee, asking Congress to pay them for cotton illegally withheld by the General Government;

The petition of Linton A. Andrews, of Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, for payment of rents for use of his property in said town for hospital; and Petitions of freedmen employed at Natchez, Mississippi, in the hospital, praying for compensation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 63) for the relief of J. G. Fell and others, trustees of Walnut Grove Mining Company; and the same was laid on the table and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the following bills; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the reports accompanying the same ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 977) for the relief of C. M. Felton, late assistant Treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, California; and

A bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers.

Mr. BURROWS, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following petitions; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of James Atkins, collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia; and

The memorial of Mortimer H. Brown, son and only heir at law of Moses Brown, for payment of amount found due for vessel lost in the service of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2991) to reimburse Richard Dillon for subsistence while in the discharge of his official duties in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 1206) for the relief of Charles J. Sands, of Brooklyn, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, reported adversely on the petition of M. W. Benning; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

He also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1627) for the relief of Daniel T. Dulaney; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2992) for the relief of George Cowles, of New Haven, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have been instructed by the Committee on War Claims to report two bills; but they are in the committee-room, and I cannot report them at this time. I ask unanimous consent to report them at the close of the morning hour.

No objection was made, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. MELLISH, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2994) for the relief of Michael Mulholland, of Vicksburgh, Mississippi; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2995) for the relief of Mrs. Emma A. Porch, of Missouri.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2996) for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2997) for the relief of George H. Schreiner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2998) for the relief of the estate of Thomas Niles, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the petition of Sarah Hutchins, asking compensation; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 2704,) for the relief of Selden Connor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the petition for the relief of Daniel Brown and James Robinson; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ASIATIC COMMERCIAL COMPANY.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill to incorporate the Asiatic Commercial Company.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is that a private bill?

Mr. CONGER. It is for the incorporation of a company. I do not remember distinctly what has been the ruling of the Chair on that point.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill, and therefore not in order under this call, and will be returned to the gentleman.

J. FRANK M'DOWELL.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1499) for the relief of J. Frank McDowell, late postmaster at Columbus, Kansas, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF INDIAN CONTRACTS.

Mr. AVERILL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the following resolution, with a recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the resolution passed by this House on the 10th day of March last, directing the Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate the matter of contracts for Indian supplies and transportation for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, be so amended and enlarged as to require said committee to make a thorough investigation into all frauds, unfairness, or irregularity, if any, connected with the administration of Indian Affairs for the years named, and that said committee make report thereon as required by the resolution aforesaid.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I raise the question of order whether this resolution is private business.

The SPEAKER. It is not. Does the gentleman object to its being reported?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I do.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2999) for the relief of Henry A. Webster, V. B. McCollum, and A. Colby, of Washington Territory, preemptioners on the Makah Indian reservation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 2139) for the relief of the eastern band of the North Carolina Cherokee Indians; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. (3000 for the reliefof Samuel W. Davidson, Henry Smith, John Gray Bynum, and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3001) for the relief of Peter J. Knapp; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, reported back bills of the following titles; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 958) for the relief of Robert Sutherland; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1108) for the relief of Alfred Fry.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3002) for the relief of Isaac Riseden, late a first lieutenant of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the following; which were laid on the table:

The petition of Charles B. Madden, for officer's traveling pay;

The petition of Daniel W. Nelson, of Knox County, Tennessee, for compensation for extra services as provost marshal in the war between the United States and Mexico; and Memorial of John Gault, jr., asking pay for services as major in the volunteer service.

He also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of H. W. Hicks, in the matter of the application of A. W. Hicks for compensation for meritorious service; moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 249) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give to George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry, an honorable discharge, to date the 7th day of June, 1870; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back adversely papers in the case of Walter D. Plowden, asking pay for services rendered as a spy during the late war; which were laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3003) for the relief of George A. Bacon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Henry Kirby, asking pay for services rendered in the Army for which he received no compensation; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back the memorial of Joel D. Mosgrove, late of the Thirty-first Ohio Infantry, praying for relief on account of services rendered and injuries received during the late war; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3004) for the relief of John C. Griffin, late second lieutenant Third Regiment East Tennessee Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DAVID BARNES.

Mr. FREEMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 2018) for the relief of David Barnes; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF MARY B. BELFIELD.

Belfield; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRA FOSTER.

Mr. VANCE also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2532) granting a pension to Ira Foster, a private in the War of 1812, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. VANCE also, from the same committee, reported back the following cases; which were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The petition of Samuel Crapin for a pension; and

The petition of Terrence Kirby, for an increase of pension.

HOLMES WIKOFF.

Mr. GOOCH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3006) authorizing the President to nominate Holmes Wikoff an assistant surgeon in the Navy; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask that the bill be put now upon its passage.

The bill was read. It authorizes the President to nominate, and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, Holmes Wikoff an assistant surgeon in the Navy, waiving his disqualification by age, but subject in all other respects to existing law and regulations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and I therefore object.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT HARDIE.

Mr. BLAND, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, reported back adversely the case of Robert Hardie; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JACOB CRAMER.

Mr. BLAND also, from the same committee, reported back the memorial of the heirs of Jacob Cramer, a soldier of the Revolution; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WILLIAM R. AND JASPER A. STRUNK.

No. 533) granting a pension to Joseph Lalond, private Company A, Eleventh Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JEMIMA MAXWELL.

Mr. SMART also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 477) granting a pension to Jemima Maxwell; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. LETITIA CARR.

Mr. McJUNKIN from the same committee, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 2066 a bill (H. R. No. 3011) granting a pension to Mrs. Letitia Carr; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN HEDDINGER.

Mr. McJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3012) granting a pension to John Heddinger; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL P. KEMP.

Mr. McJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2715 a bill (H. R. No. 3013) granting a pension to Samuel P. Kemp; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. CAROLINE DUNCAN.

Mr. McJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1421 a bill (H. R. No. 3014) to place the name of Mrs. Caroline Duncan on the pension-rolls; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARGARET A. CHANTRY.

Mr. McJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3015) granting a pension to Margaret A. Chantry, widow of Alfred W. Chantry, late colonel of the Sixty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH BURNS.

Mr. McJUNKIN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Sarah Burns for a pension; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HUGH. P. LYTLE.

Mr. McJUNKIN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 568) granting a pension to Hugh P. Lytle, late a private in Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

IRA DOUTHARD.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3016) granting a pension to Ira Douthard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JACOB GROSCH.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1842 a bill (H. R. No. 3017) granting a pension to Jacob Grosch, Company B, Eighth Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JACOB PARROTT.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3018) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Parrott, Company K, Thirty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE H. REYNOLDS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3019) granting a pension to George H. Reynolds; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE POMEROY.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2271 a bill (H. R. No. 3020) granting a pension to George Pomeroy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS, ETC., OF MURDERED SOLDIERS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3021) granting pensions to widows, children, dependent mothers and fathers, or orphan brothers and sisters, of those soldiers who were murdered by guerrillas at Centralia, Missouri, in 1864.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. This is a private bill. There were about twenty-seven of these soldiers killed in 1864 by guerrillas. The committee report back the bill favorably.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SARAH A. TIMMINS.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3022) granting a pension to Sarah A. Timmins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANDREW MASON.

Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3023) for the relief of Andrew Mason; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN YOUNG---ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Patents, reported adversely on the petition of John Young for the extension of his patent for a washing and wringing machine; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. WARD.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, also, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3024) to enable William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for a shell-molding machine; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to enable William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for a shell-molding machine.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent granted to him on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1857, for a machine for molding shells, for the term of seven years, from and after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years for which said letters-patent were granted, such application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the aforesaid original term of said patent. And upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to consider and determine the same in the same manner, upon giving the same notice, and with the same effect as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law, and as if the original term of said patent had not expired: Provided, That no person shall be held liable for the infringement of said patent, if extended, for making use of said invention since the expiration of the original term of said patent, and prior to the date of its extension.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. There is; and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the House will dispose of the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report had better be finished.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the report be printed. We want time to examine the case. I think that the bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union anyhow; it is a public bill.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. O, no; it is a private bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not a public bill, nor does it involve an appropriation of money.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would suggest that the report be printed in the RECORD, and that the bill go over until to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, for extension of letters-patent for a machine for molding shells, makes the following report:

Letters-patent were granted to the said William H. Ward, December 1, 1857, for the term of fourteen years, and expired December 1, 1871, for a machine for molding shells. Previous to this invention all the molding for the manufacturing of explosive shells was done by hand, without the use of machinery. This was therefore a foundation patent. Mr. Ward commenced experimenting upon this machine as early as 1841, and came to Washington that year and had a trial of his shells before the authorities, which received favorable notice from them, and was approved by Hon. John C. Spencer, then Secretary of War, as is shown by the records at the Ordnance Department.

The advantages of shells made with this machine over those manufactured by hand are great, as they are so made as to be exactly alike, and artillerymen are thereby enabled to send them more accurately, as experiments conclusively show. The evidence shows that during the Crimean war Mr. Ward had extensive practice with this description of shell and the machine for producing them, in Europe, where he then was. At the close of the Crimean war Mr. Ward returned to this country, and came to Washington and was informed by Captain Ingraham, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, that if he would manufacture a machine for molding shells that would produce shells equal to their hand-molding he would take it. On the 29th day of October, 1856, Mr. Ward agreed with the Chief of the Bureau to construct one of his machines for him, at a cost not to exceed $7,500 for the first one. Mr. Ward went immediately to the Patent Office and filed a caveat therefor.

The machine and one flask was ready for use some time in December following, and shells were manufactured. Captain Ingraham being informed that the machine was ready, went to Alexandria to inspect it; and after doing so, expressed himself as perfectly satisfied with the utility of the machine. The machine was finally removed to the navy-yard in Washington, and Captain Ingraham issued an official order for its trial, and it resulted in a favorable report by Captain Ingraham. By using this machine a mold can be prepared and the core adjusted in six minutes, while the old process required several men some hours in doing the same work.

Mr. Ward has repeatedly tried to settle with the Government for this machine, but without success. Although he has received repeated assurances from Government officials that he should be remunerated. The Government made use of this invention during the war, and received great benefit from the same.

The following letter from the Navy Department shows how this invention is there regarded at the present time:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 14, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your letter of the 5th instant, in reference to the machine furnished by Mr. W. H. Ward, of Auburn, New York, that the machine was furnished to the Department and used for the service of the Government; that it is of present use and value to the service, and that no payment has been made Mr. Ward for the same.

Very respectfully,

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. C. D. MACDOUGALL,
House of Representatives.

From the nature of this invention the only consumer or party that could make use of the same was the General Government, as the public could in no way require this machine for any purpose whatever. Mr. Ward, in good faith, placed it in the possession of the Government, relying upon the assurances of officials that he should be suitably rewarded. For this reason Mr. Ward made no application to the Commissioner of Patents under the law to have the same extended, as he could and would have done had he not relied upon the Government to pay him what they honestly owed him. The evidence shows that Mr. Ward has expended a great amount of time in perfecting and bringing into use this invention, as well as $20,171.86 in money, including principal and interest. In return he has only received $300 which the Government advanced to him several years ago, when he required the same absolutely for the necessaries of life.

The committee are of the opinion that Mr. Ward ought not to lose the control of his said invention in this manner, and therefore recommend the accompanying bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to make a few reports from the Committee on War Claims for reference only.

No objection was made.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to know what has become of the bill reported from the Committee on Patents. I object to the gentleman from Connecticut reporting.

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the gentleman from Michigan refers went over under the rule at the expiration of the morning hour. The leave granted to the gentleman from Connecticut by the House does not interfere in the slightest degree with the bill to which the gentleman from Michigan refers. That bill was in the morning hour; the morning hour expired during the reading of the report. The bill is still in the morning hour, and is the first thing there; and no other report of a private nature can be made during the Forty-third Congress until that bill is disposed of. If the gentleman could get the bill in a position where it would have any greater advantage than that, the Chair does not see how it could be done.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has made himself perfectly intelligible to me.

CORA A. SLOCUMB, ET AL.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2993) for the relief of Cora A. Slocumb, and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. KELLOGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 609) for the relief of Norman Wiard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to call up a special order, which I think will not take much time to dispose of.

The SPEAKER. At two o'clock the Committee on the District of Columbia is entitled to the floor. The Chair is advised by that committee that they have but a single bill to report to-day, and one that in their judgment will not give rise to much discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I will ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia be allowed to proceed with their business now.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair was about to suggest. If there be no objection that course will be pursued.

No objection was made.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD.

Mr. RICE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3025) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company may enter the city of Georgetown with their railroad, and may construct the same within the limits of said city on and by the following route: Beginning at a point on the northeastern boundary line of the District of Columbia; thence to the mouth of Piney Branch of Rock Creek by a route north of the Soldiers' Home, and avoiding any property of the United States; thence by way of Rock Creek to a point near its mouth; thence by way of Water street, in Georgetown, to a point near the northeastern terminus of the Aqueduct bridge in said city; thence along the Potomac River to the northwestern boundary of the District of Columbia, so as to connect with the Washington and Ohio Railroad, with authority to construct a bridge across the Potomac River above navigation, upon plans and specifications to be first approved in writing by the Secretary of War; and also to construct a branch railroad outside of the limits of the city of Washington to connect its road with the Washington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad: Provided, That the location of said route herein defined shall be subject to the approval of the engineer in charge of public buildings and grounds: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to permit or authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to enter upon or use any property owned or controlled or in any manner to interfere with any right or privilege heretofore granted to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company by their charters or amendments thereto, without the consent of said Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company and its lessees is first had and obtained: And provided further, That said Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company shall establish a depot at some point in Georgetown, on Water street, between Rock Creek and the Aqueduct bridge.

SEC. 2. That the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company shall have the right to use the tracks of said Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to be laid under the provisions of this act, from the intersection of the same with the Metropolitan branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to the city of Georgetown upon such reasonable terms as may be agreed upon or Congress prescribe.

SEC. 3. This act may be altered, amended, or repealed at any time, and all rights and privileges herein conveyed to said company shall cease and determine unless the said company complete its road hereby authorized to Georgetown with at least one track within three years from the passage of this act.

Mr. RICE. I desire to say that this is a substitute for a bill introduced and referred to the committee a month ago. The Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company, that is now building its road in the State of Maryland, was very desirous to have the right of way through the District along the south front of this city up to Georgetown. That bill was presented to the House and, after discussion, that request was refused. The company is very anxious to have the matter settled where and how they can get into Georgetown, as it makes a very great difference to them in obtaining money for building the road. They have consented to this bill which I have just reported, which is very much more expensive to them, but still it will answer their purpose. The committee think the House will offer no objection to it. I am ready to explain anything that is not understood about it, so far as I can do so.

Mr. DAWES. Does this bill continue the road partially finished through and around the asylum grounds?

Mr. RICE. That has not entered in any way whatever into the discussion before the committee. What the company now ask is, instead of crossing the Eastern Branch as before proposed, to cross the flats above the head of the Eastern Branch. They start from Brandywine, nine miles from Washington, and proceed northerly until they get to Bladensburgh, six miles north of Washington; then from Bladensburgh to a point called Piney Branch, six miles from Washington, a little northwest of the city; then they go up Piney Branch to the valley of Rock Creek, which, as gentlemen are very well aware, divides Washington from Georgetown; then down the valley of Rock Creek to Aqueduct bridge on the Potomac River, where they hope to be permitted to erect a depot; then they go up the Potomac River above the head of navigation, and ask permission to build a bridge across the river to enable them to unite with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which is to run to the coal-fields of Virginia. When that is done this Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad, with the aid of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, will extend from the coal-fields of Virginia to the mouth of the Potomac River, and will have a depot at Georgetown, which is very desirable.

The committee have examined this bill thoroughly and believe that it is a proper bill to be passed. We see no objection to it, and if any gentleman has any, I should be very glad to hear it, in order that I may try and remove it.

Mr. DAWES. My inquiry arose out of the peculiar location of this road in connection with the public property of the United States. When this road obtained its charter there was inserted in it some phraseology to which I will call attention. It was in substance this: that it should in no way interfere with any of the property of the United States "in the city of Washington." I give the substance of it; I have not the bill before me. Now, that valuable property of the United States, the Insane Asylum, is just outside of the city of Washington, but in the District of Columbia. Without any knowledge of its affecting their rights at all, and nothing in the bill indicating that there was the slightest intention on the part of this company to interfere with their rights, they have run their road right around that property and between it and the water's edge, cutting it off entirely from water communication, and compelling them to ask Congress to make such an appropriation as will enable them to build a high wall so as to keep the inmates of the asylum from going down on the railroad track.

Mr. RICE. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman one moment, and it may save some time. The road contemplated by this bill has nothing whatever to do with that portion which runs by the asylum.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that; but I was in hopes that this change of location would reach a little farther down and strike the road on the other side of the asylum premises. That was the reason I made the inquiry. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States improvidently, by the uncertain provision put into that bill—I do not suppose it was put in designedly; it is sufficient for me to say that it was done accidentally—confining this road to the injunction not to interfere with the property of the United States within the city of Washington, left it so that it could be located in such a manner as greatly to impair the usefulness of one of the best institutions of the kind in the country.

As I am reminded by my colleague, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] the location of this institution was selected twenty years ago because it had an approach by water, so that provisions, coal, &c., could reach it in that way, rather than be carried as freight over the Anacostia and four miles, or some such distance, to the institution.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Is that an objection to the proposed road or the road already constructed?

Mr. DAWES. One objection was that there might be bathing establishments for the inmates of the institution, numbering six hundred and more, many of them the unfortunate insane of the Army and Navy. By this road the interests of that institution—which is most remarkable for the prudence of its management and the great care manifested for the comfort of the inmates—are most seriously interfered with. And I learn that it is proposed to have that road continued as a freight road, so as to have the advantage of that water's edge, whatever that advantage may be, at the expense of the United States.

The first knowledge that the Government of the United States had of the intention to lay the road there was when the engineers came there to set the stakes. Application was then made to the Secretary of the Interior, having the custody of the property connected with that institution, to know what those preparations meant. The Secretary expressed as much surprise as anybody; but on looking into the phraseology of the law to which I have called attention he came to the conclusion that he was powerless in the matter. Under that construction of the law, since we adjourned last March that road has been constructed. Now, when that company comes in and asks for the privilege of going around Washington on the other side, it seems to me not unreasonable to require them to put their whole track on the other side of this institution and to touch the Potomac for the first time farther down.

I am not familiar enough with this subject to enter into the discussion to any great extent. But my attention has been called to the trouble resulting from the location of the road upon the water-front of that institution; and I have witnessed the efforts of the superintendent of the institution to protect the inmates from the perils which must attend the running of trains of cars right by the side of the asylum. In this way the interests of the institution, located as was supposed away from any such dangers, have been impaired.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have investigated very carefully the question to which my colleague [Mr. DAWES] has alluded; and it seems to me demonstrable that this railroad is an entire trespass where the track has been constructed along the grounds of the Insane Asylum. The question of law is a very simple one, as I think the House will see in a moment.

The law is very well settled that when a railroad company is authorized to build its track from point A to point B, those points being at a considerable distance from each other, (the distance in this case being some miles,) no authority is given to the corporation to enter upon property already appropriated to another public use, unless it is practically impossible (I use the word "impossible" as generally used in such matters) to build the road without doing so.

Now, Congress last year authorized this corporation to build its track from a particular point to another specified point; and it was perfectly practicable to get an advantageous location between those points without entering upon the property of the national asylum—property which the United States had appropriated to this public purpose.

Mr. RICE. The superintendent of the asylum assented to the location.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. He had no authority to assent to it; and I do not understand that he has done so. It is true there was in the bill an additional provision that the road should in no case enter upon any property of the United States in the city of Washington; but that was not intended to give the company authority to enter upon such property outside of the city where it was not absolutely necessary; it was simply designed to provide that in no case, on no pretense of necessity, should the company undertake to enter upon property of the United States in the city. This company had just as much right, under the general provision of the law, to build its track within a few feet of this Capitol as to build it along the water-front of the National Insane Asylum. This location, as has been suggested by my colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] was selected twenty years ago by Miss Dix because of the advantages to result in the education, care, and discipline of the patients from having the property upon a river, where patients that could be trusted so to do, might sit upon the river-bank, bathe, fish, use boats, and where the institution could receive its supplies of coal, provisions, &c., by water. This company has laid its track on piles upon the water-front, close to the shore, rendering it necessary for the proper discipline and care of patients that a high fence should be erected cutting them off entirely from access to the river.

I think, sir, that now, when this Congress has this company before it asking additional privileges, it is our duty to see that its encroachment upon property of the United States devoted to a philanthropic purpose shall be put an end to. I therefore move the following amendment:

That the Attorney-General be directed to take measures to protect the rights of the United States in the property occupied by the National Insane Asylum, and the water of the river adjoining thereto, and cause the track of said railroad to be removed therefrom.

Mr. RICE. The road contemplated in the bill now before the House has nothing whatever to do with that location; it does not approach it; and on what authority should an officer of the United States be called upon to take this action when the House is discussing the permission to build another road?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is the same corporation.

Mr. RICE. It makes no difference about the corporation. The road to which the gentleman has referred has nothing to do with this bill; and I object to this amendment because the opposition on this matter is factious. What the railroad company has done in regard to the insane asylum I know not. The bill now presented to the House contemplates a road which will not come near to nor approach the insane asylum; and any opposition on that ground is for the purpose of defeating this bill, unjustly as I believe. I believe so, sir.

Mr. DAWES. Just one word. I have not the slightest objection to the passage of this bill provided there shall be put upon it the condition that this road shall take up so much of its track running along the insane asylum on the other side of the river. I have not the slightest desire to interfere with it at all.

Mr. RICE. We have no right to interfere with a road which has nothing at all to do with this bill. This road does not go near the insane asylum.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to say a word to the gentleman from Illinois. About three weeks ago, Miss Dix, a philanthropic lady, called upon me here, asking an introduction, for the purpose of saying that twenty years ago, under the administration of President Fillmore, she selected the site of this hospital because of these river advantages, and asking my attention to this invasion of its territory by this railroad company. She said, as my colleague has said, that the Secretary of the Interior was of the opinion this road had a legal right to go there. Such legal experience as I have had has made me familiar with these cases. I argued a case last year in regard to this point of law which I have stated, and it seems to me the Secretary is wrong.

Mr. RICE. There is a bill in reference to that matter before the Senate.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have no other knowledge of this railroad. It does seem to me now, when this same corporation comes in here and asks another favor of Congress in regard to getting into Washington, it is proper to fix a condition to the grant of that favor that proper steps shall be taken to test the legal rights of the United States Government in regard to a portion of the same road. But I do not think it is quite fair for the gentleman from Illinois—and he will excuse me for saying so, and I do it with entire respect for him—I say I do not think it is quite fair, on that state of facts, to impute the desire to save that philanthropic institution from invasion of its rights by this very road a factious opposition to this bill.

Mr. DAWES. Let me read the original statute to show the phraseology.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] has yielded to me a moment, and the gentleman from Massachusetts can get the floor so easy and I cannot.

Mr. DAWES. I yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House proposes—and I should like to have the attention of the House for one moment while I say what I have to say—an entirely different and new route from the one which was before us a few weeks ago and to which so many gentlemen objected, and to which I objected then. This proposes to connect with a railroad some four or five miles northeast of here, in the neighborhood of what is called Fort Slocum, by the way of Fort Stevens, on the Seventh street road, near where the battle-ground was in the last war, and beyond Fort Stevens to pass down the valley of a little brook called the Piney Branch across Fourteenth street, a mile and a half beyond the boundary of the city, down in that hollow and through grounds heretofore surveyed for a national park, to Rocky Run. It is entirely removed from any connection with the business or roads of the city, and, so far as I know, might pass under the thoroughfares and bridges leading up Seventh and Fourteenth streets so as to be no obstruction to the passage of carriages—passing through, as it does, what is almost a wilderness. There could be no point chosen of approach to Georgetown which would run through improved property with less danger to all interests than the route here selected.

Let me say to the gentleman about the road on the other side of the river around the lunatic asylum. They lay great stress upon the fact that there has been built down upon the edge of the water at the foot of the high bluff upon which the lunatic asylum has been built a railroad track. I know in some States and cities they will not locate a lunatic asylum unless they can have a railroad in close access to it. I do not know whether it is important here or not; but I know as well as the gentlemen who make these objections that the top of the bluff is some two hundred feet above this railroad, and that all around the ground is the high fence they speak off, a stone wall, I believe, to keep the patients in. I know, as every gentleman here knows who has visited that asylum, that the sides of this bluff are rough, rocky, and wooded. They are not cleared up for pleasure grounds or for passage at all. My friend from Massachusetts could not climb up them, and I venture to say that with all his agility he could not slide down them. He could not get from the top himself, nor could his family or his friends in viewing the beautiful muddy Potomac get down the precipice with ease. It would take a lunatic to get from the top of the ridge down through the woods to the water. The æsthetic view he presents of wandering on the banks of such a woody, rough precipice as this to see the scenery sounds well; but there is nothing like it; it is all in the gentleman's eye.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is clearly where it ought to be.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; that is where it ought to be. Now the grounds are beautifully situated. They are lofty, overlooking the city. But no lunatic that is now confined in that asylum wants to get down those banks to the river, and no lunatic that is not confined in the asylum ought to want the privilege of getting down that woody precipice to the river. The gentleman has not observed the ground. There is through Uniontown an approach to the river which they can always use; but there is no other access up or down those banks, as far as I have observed, and I cannot see for the life of me why, for an institution which has from three-quarters of a mile to a mile and a half—I do not remember the exact distance—of river front at the only portion of the river where the water is deep enough for vessels to approach the shore, there should not be an access the denial of which can be of any earthly practical benefit to the officers or inmates of the asylum or the Government.

I know nothing of this railroad, and care nothing about it; but I have had my attention called to the subject of what constituted proper grounds for asylums and their uses, and with the knowledge I have acquired in examining such institutions in my own and other States with reference to their location, I see no reason in the world why that water-front along the only deep channel there is in the Potomac River should not be used for commercial or railroad purposes if the necessities of commerce require it, if it can be done without interfering in any manner with the uses to which it has been applied by the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say one word in connection with this subject. I think my colleague [Mr. RICE] misapprehends the power of Congress over this matter. If I understand him correctly, he interrupted the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that Congress has now nothing to do with the question of the present location of the road; that it is beyond the power of Congress.

Now, it is to this point that I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment. This railroad company comes here now asking for enlarged privileges, asking for the privilege of extending its road a considerable distance through the District. It has no power to extend its road further without the authority of Congress given for that purpose. Now, certainly, it is clearly within the power of Congress to provide that this railroad company shall not extend its road any further or exercise any other right beyond that it now exercises unless it shall surrender certain rights which it now has. That, it seems to me, is a clear proposition. If this road is now located where it ought not to be located, and if it should be conceded that it had ample power to locate there under previous laws, we yet have the power to say to the company, "That is an authority which ought not to have been given, and before we give you any further rights in this District, or anywhere else where we have exclusive jurisdiction, you shall take up that track." We can say, "You take from us any further power or right on the condition that it is with that proviso." Now, I am not sufficiently familiar with the location to be able to say myself whether this road can be built around the rear of the asylum or not.

Mr. DAWES. They propose to do that.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Do they propose to do that also?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir; they propose to build on the other side of the asylum.

Mr. RICE. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. DAWES. That is my understanding.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have not so understood it. But at all events it is claimed by many on the floor who are familiar with the subject that the road can be built without any difficulty at all to the rear of the asylum. If that can be done it should be done.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The company has that power now.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. But what I rose for was simply to call the attention of my colleague to this fact, that it is within the power of Congress to do this if it is thought best to do it.

Mr. RICE. It is within the power of Congress. There is no denial of that. This Congress gave the right to this company to build a railroad where they have built it; and now because somebody objects it is contended in this House that Congress has the power to compel them to take up their road, to compel them to destroy their property by such a suicidal act. We do not deny the power except that we deny the justice of exercising that power, and that ought to be a denial of the power in this House. I yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who desires to read a provision of the law.

Mr. DAWES. I spoke from memory in reference to the act under which this company have located their track on the asylum grounds. I will read the law:

> That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the said company to enter upon any lot or square or part thereof owned by the United States, within the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, for the purpose of locating or constructing their said railroad.

The District of Columbia is spoken of instead of the cities of Washington and Georgetown in every other part of the bill, and I suppose this was entirely accidental. But the consequences have been very serious as to this lot belonging to the United States, and I do not see why, if it was necessary to warn them off from every foot of land owned by the United States within the cities of Washington and Georgetown, it would not have been proper to have warned them also off this valuable property, just outside of the city of Washington.

Now I wish to call attention to the last clause in the act:

> Provided, That Congress shall have power to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

This very bill before us now is of that character. It is a bill supplementary to that act. Now, we propose simply to say to the railroad company, "If you desire this authority to go through the cities of Washington and Georgetown and take your railroad there, it is but just and fair that you should take up this track on this ground of the United States, which we have improvidently let you lay there."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. RICE. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether any remonstrance or memorial or intimation of any kind, from any source whatever, in regard to the injurious effect of the road already built upon the property of the asylum, has come to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. RICE. None, at any time whatever, so far as I know.

Mr. HALE, of New York. There is no question, Mr. Speaker, as to the entire power of Congress over this railroad. Congress has power to take away the franchise utterly. That power was reserved by the original act; but I submit to the House whether there is any propriety or justice in legislating to take away property or rights from a corporation which were conferred by a former bill until at least the subject has been examined by this House, through the proper channel, the committee to whom it is referred.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I hope the gentleman will wait until I get through.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I only desire to ask the gentleman one thing.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I must decline to yield to the gentleman. I do not misstate the facts. The gentleman is simply interrupting the line of my argument. I say this, and I beg the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to it, if he will listen; I do not think there is any propriety in this House assuming to act on the naked statement of any member of this House, however eminent or distinguished, be it the gentleman from Massachusetts on the right side of the aisle, [Mr. DAWES,] or the gentleman from Massachusetts on the left side of the aisle, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] If it is true that the grants heretofore made to this corporation have been grants that are mischievous in their working and that ought to be repealed, it is a matter that should be inquired into by some appropriate committee of this House, and the House ought not to act on the mere statement of one or the other of these gentlemen.

I say, therefore, that if the amendment proposed to this bill is to be insisted on, the bill ought to be referred back to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is the appropriate committee for the consideration of the question, that they may examine the subject and be able to report the facts to the House.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. There seems to be enough in this matter anyhow to put Congress on its guard with reference to any legislation which may take place in regard to extending the franchises of this corporation. I know nothing about it except from what has been stated here in the House during the debate on this bill, but I am satisfied that at the other time when it was pending I was fooled, and voted for a bill which on further consideration I would not have voted for, and for which I understand now this bill is reported as a substitute by the committee. It is charged, and it seems to me with some degree of reason, that the location of the track of this company between the insane asylum and the Potomac River was a wrong done to the institution and to the Government and a violation of the spirit of the law. I am not willing to leave the matter, as the gentleman from Massachusetts is, in the hands of the Attorney-General to determine whether the law was properly construed or not. I propose in granting further franchises to this railroad company to insist on their compliance with what, as I believe, was the real meaning of the law. The power of Congress is complete to do it. In conferring further franchises it may impose conditions which will make the company do what Congress thinks they ought to do with reference to the franchises heretofore granted. I therefore desire to offer the following amendment to section 1, which the gentleman can accept or not, as he sees fit:

That all the rights conferred by this act are to be exercised and enjoyed by said company only upon condition that said company shall first remove all the work it has done toward building its track between the insane asylum and the Potomac River, and on the further condition that it shall never locate or operate said road or any part thereof between the said asylum and the Potomac River.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I like that amendment better than mine, but I like the one of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] better than either

Mr. RICE. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to treat this matter seriously, because it is a matter of importance. A year or two since I became somewhat familiar with the subject. I think this company have gone on in good faith. I say now that I have never been an advocate of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. I never received any consideration at their hands, and I have fought one or two battles against them; but in this matter I think we cannot go back on what we have done without committing a breach of good faith toward them. They have located their road at this point by the authority of Congress; they have gone on with their works for two years.

What is there now against them? A bill was brought in here the other day which did not give this road any more rights than we have given some other roads. I thought then, and I still think, that they can go along the route which they proposed without any disadvantage to anybody. But they were voted down, and I helped to do it. Although we were giving them but little more than we have given to other railroad companies, I thought there was some objection to their bill.

The Committee on the District of Columbia have now come in with a bill which, it seems to me, is entirely unobjectionable. It proposes a route entirely outside of the traffic of the city, outside of the streets and wharves, and public institutions; except that, not by any legislation now proposed but by former legislation, it goes across the rear of these asylum grounds.

Mr. GARFIELD. It goes across the front.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It goes across the grounds, whether in front or the rear; it goes next to the river. The gentleman says that is in front. Then the front of that building is on the back side of it, as is the case with most of the public buildings in Washington. Now what have we here in evidence against them? The only thing presented, to justify our voting down a committee of eleven, is the statement of some lady who I venture to say was never down to the river, and could never get there at the point where this railroad goes. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has told us that he knows from personal observation that the agile gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] cannot himself get down the bank at the place where it is said these men and women, the inmates of the asylum, are to go down to the river and bathe. We have the statement of this very fanciful lady, a very good woman, and a very benevolent woman. I want to know if we are to follow the fancy of a lady, a benevolent lady if you please, who has never investigated the subject except at a distance and in a newspaper, and vote down the report of a committee of eleven men who have examined this subject.

Here is the report of the committee, in which it is stated that this road does not interfere with that asylum. Although this matter has been under consideration for a month, no human being has appeared before that committee to remonstrate against this proposition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says that he wants this institution to have the privilege of lifting up the coal they use from the river bank at that point. They would have to have very high tackle and elevators to get the coal up from the river to the top of the hill at the point the gentleman suggests.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has never been there, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has misled him. He says that I do not know anything about it. Perhaps I do not, but eighteen years ago, co-operating with Senators and Members——

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman need not take my time now.

Mr. DAWES. I want to tell the gentleman——

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I know more than the gentleman does about it.

Mr. DAWES. You do?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think I do.

Mr. DAWES. Then I will say no more about it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not think the gentleman ever went down to the river at that point.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman ought to know that there has been a wharf there for eighteen years, at which all of the provisions for this institution have been landed from lighters.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. That is true, and that shows just how little the gentleman knows about the matter. The road does not go near the wharf at the point the gentleman suggests. You can stand on the top of the hill, where this road runs along, and see all of Washington and Georgetown and the Potomac, and nearly all of Virginia. This road does not cut off any prospect at all. It goes along a point where no human being can get down without endangering his life. It does not interfere with the wharf privileges in any way.

I ask this House to treat this committee with the same consideration that it treats other committees of the House. No human being has appeared before the committee to remonstrate against this bill. You have already said that this road shall not run along the wharves of this city. Where can they go? If this road has been illegally constructed along by the asylum, then anybody can order it to be taken up. All that is to be done is to get the question in court. It is not for us to assume that it is illegally there, for we have given them the authority to go there, and no human being has appeared before the committee to claim that they have acted illegally. That question is raised here now for the first time, on the suggestion of some benevolent lady who has never herself fully investigated the matter.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we have given the company this right, and the company has accepted it in good faith. The present bill does not propose to build a road there. If the road already constructed is illegal it can be removed; but I say, and the evidence coming before the committee shows the fact, that nobody is complaining except some one on a mere fancy; that the wharf can be as well used after this road is completed as it is used to-day; and there is no other location that the company can select. They must either go between the river and the asylum or they must go miles away, around the mountain, which would require a circuit almost impracticable for them to make.

I have no interest in this railroad company, no interest in any railroad company; but I want to see these corporations treated fairly. It is for the interest of the people of Washington and of the country that railroad facilities connecting with this city should be extended; that there should be depots at proper locations; and although we may be prejudiced against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, we are bound to treat these companies fairly, as we would treat private individuals. This company is only asking its just rights. The present bill does not give this corporation any rights so far as the asylum grounds are concerned beyond what it already has; and

I believe that the asylum grounds are not interfered with by this road. It does not interfere with the wharfage or the view; it interferes with the view of nobody except some visionary who has not investigated the matter.

Mr. RICE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. COTTON.]

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, we have here a bill which all concede to be right; there is no objection to its provisions; the only point made in opposition to it is that in a former law passed in 1872 an error was committed in respect to the asylum grounds. Now I think we should pass this bill as it stands, and if the former law needs to be corrected we can do that at another time. That law reserves to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act at any time; and I will say that as one member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I invariably insist on having that provision inserted in every bill recommended by the committee affecting any street railroad or any steam railroad, so that Congress may have absolute control over these corporations. That right being reserved in the former law in regard to this company, I think we should not stop now to adopt these amendments proposed here hastily, which are suggested to remedy what is claimed to be an existing evil under the old law. In fact, however, we have no official information that there is anything wrong in the old law. We have not had before our committee a single officer of that institution making a complaint against the provisions of that act.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Here is a letter from the superintendent of the asylum setting forth all the facts on the subject.

Mr. COTTON. I have never seen it; it has never been before our committee. The superintendent never appeared before us to make objection. I understand, however, that the Senate (if I may be permitted to refer to that body) is maturing, under the direction of Dr. Nichols, the officer in charge of that institution, a bill to define the location of the track under the old law, placing it on piles a little outside of the present location, which will remedy the entire difficulty. Now I think we should leave the matter to be corrected by that bill or some other; that the present bill, which has been matured after much thought, should now be passed without amendment. No objection is urged by any one against it. It contains a provision that all property of the United States shall be avoided in the location of the road now contemplated. Thus this bill avoids any such question as is now raised in regard to the former act. This track goes away outside of the city limits, and it enters Georgetown by way of Rock Creek. I think it due to the committee that this bill, which has been well considered, should be passed, and not embarrassed by any inconsiderate and hasty legislation proposed by gentlemen who say themselves that they know nothing about the matter they seek to remedy. If there is any evil in the former act, let it be remedied in another bill under the authority reserved to Congress to repeal or alter the former law. I am certainly ready to join in correcting any error of that kind, if there is any.

Mr. RICE. I am obliged to call the previous question in order to save time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was first upon the following amendment of Mr. WARD, of Illinois:

Add to the first section the following:
That all the rights conferred by this act are to be exercised and enjoyed by said company only upon the condition that said company shall first remove all the work it has done toward locating its track between the insane asylum and the Potomac River, and on the further condition that it shall never locate or operate said road or any part thereof between said asylum and the Potomac River.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 54, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARD, of Illinois, and Mr. RICE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 74, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I withdraw my amendment, as its object is accomplished by that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] just adopted.

Mr. PACKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] yields to allow an additional amendment at the end of the first section.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent, as the previous question is operating.

Mr. PACKER. There will be no objection, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no other railroad shall be crossed by any railroad or branch railroad to be constructed under the provisions of this act, at grade, except by and with the consent and agreement of the railroad company owning or operating such other railroad.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object to the amendment.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND GULF OF MEXICO SHIP-CANAL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the ship-canal to connect the Mississippi River with the Gulf of Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES RIVER AND KANAWHA CANAL.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of April 14, 1874, transmitting a report on the James River and Kanawha Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, for three days; to Mr. WALLACE for two weeks from to-day; to Mr. PLATT, of New York, for one week; to Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, for ten days; to Mr. ROSS for five days; to Mr. SHERWOOD indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family; to Mr. LEACH for one week; to Mr. CORWIN for ten days; and to Mr. HODGES for twenty days.

BENJAMIN MOORE.

On motion of Mr. HAGANS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of the heirs of Benjamin Moore, no adverse report having been made in the case.

STATE TAXATION OF RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. HERNDON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3026) declaring lands hitherto granted to railroad companies subject to State taxation; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3027) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Van Ronsilear Morgan, Thomas M. Jones, and Charles H. Fauntleroy, of Virginia, and A. S. Taylor, of Maryland; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) that all the legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States on Van Ronsilear Morgan, Thomas M. Jones, and Charles H. Fauntleroy, citizens of the State of Virginia, and A. S. Taylor, a citizen of the State of Maryland, be removed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third tim e, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MALADMINISTRATION.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to call up for action at this time the special order, the bill relating to maladministration in the civil service of the United States. I am about to leave the city for an absence of ten days.

Mr. MOREY. I object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is a special order.

The SPEAKER. But subject to going into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar or the appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask my friend from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, not to press his motion, as this bill will take but a few minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not object if an agreement can be had to call a vote upon it at once.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will call for a vote early. If the House does not want discussion, I do not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should rather try the sense of the House on going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 56; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. MYERS tellers.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 65.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand a further count?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. MYERS. I do not demand a further count. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew it. This is private-bill day, and we ought to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and take it up for consideration.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 49, noes 59; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 21, noes 62.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 122, not voting 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Berry, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crutchfield, Dunnell, Durham, Field, Fort, Giddings, Gooch, Hagans, John T. Harris, Harrison, Herndon, Houghton, Hunton, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lewis, Lofland, Lynch, Magee, Maynard, MacDougall, McLean, Mellish, Milliken, Myers, Niblack, Nunn, Pelham, Pike, Poland, Randall, Read, Richmond, Robbins, James W. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stephens, St. John, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Waddell, Marcus L. Ward, White, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodford—96.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the House shall now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. And pending that I move that when the House shall go into Committee of the Whole all debate on the pending paragraph shall be closed in one minute.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the gentleman, on behalf of myself and many other gentlemen who have charge of bills on the Private Calendar, whether he proposes to insist to-morrow also on the House going into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill? If that is his intention, we ought to know it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask the House to-morrow to go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill, and I hope the House will agree to do so.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that when the Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill all debate on the pending paragraph shall be closed in one minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is that paragraph?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows;

For publishing the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress in pamphlet form and in newspapers, $86,000: Provided, That after the 4th day of March, 1875, the publication of the laws in newspapers shall cease.

The question being taken, there were ayes 110, noes not counted.

So the motion to close debate was agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield the remaining minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In reference to the point of order which was discussed last night, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to this proposition: The effect of this proviso, if we pass it, is to enact a new law. It is put in an appropriation bill, and if it stands by a vote of the House and of the Senate it becomes a new law limiting the appropriation for the publication of the laws in newspapers. Therefore it must be in order to amend it; because suppose we repeal hereafter the present law, then here would be a new law which controls this matter, and we would have a new law passed under a ruling that we cannot amend that new law. It is a provision of the law directly affecting a certain state and condition of public business. It is offered here for our votes. But when we desire to vote to amend it before we vote for it we are told by those who go for it that we cannot.

The rule, as I understand it, is that no amendment can be offered to an appropriation bill to change existing law. But when the appropriation bill itself contains a section to change the existing law, I respectfully submit that the rule does not apply and that we may amend that section. There ought not to be any section in an appropriation bill changing, extending, or in any other way interfering with the law. If the committee put in such a provision, then that provision should be subject to amendment. And I respectfully submit to the Chair and the committee that this rule, that no amendment changing the existing law shall be made to an appropriation bill, does not apply to a case where the provision of the bill is of itself a change of existing law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a vote. The time for debate has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The question would be on an amendment offered originally by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PURMAN] and then withdrawn, if it were still pending. But the Chair does not find in the RECORD that it has been renewed by any gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought it had been renewed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] offered an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. That was ruled out of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. STORM. I raise the point of order that that amendment was ruled out yesterday, and that no appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment originally offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] and now renewed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is ruled out upon the ground that it changes existing law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To that decision I desire the attention of the committee, and I shall respectfully appeal from it.

Mr. STORM. Is the point of order debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will modify my amendment and move to insert in line 305, before the word "cease," the word "not;" so that it will read:

Provided, That after the 4th day of March, 1875, the publication of the laws in the newspapers shall not cease.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the point of order upon the amendment as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is ruled out.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. From that ruling I have the honor to appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Is that question debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to suggest a single point.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to debate.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand that it is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The House before going into committee made an order that debate should cease upon the pending paragraph in one minute. The point of order being made, the Chair thinks that no debate is in order which would continue beyond that one minute to which the House restricted it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to speak for half a minute.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Give him twenty-five seconds.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to make an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. An objection being made, the Chair is compelled to enforce the order of the House.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does the Chair decide that the point of order is not debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the point of order is not debatable.

Mr. HALE, of New York. From that decision I appeal.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman cannot take an appeal upon an appeal. There is one appeal pending now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair respectfully rules that when an appeal is pending, no other appeal can be taken until that is decided.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the appeal taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts from the decision of the Chair.

The question was put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and on a division the Chair announced that there were—ayes 136, noes 11.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I submit that no quorum voted.

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred and forty-six members are a constitutional quorum.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How many voted?

The CHAIRMAN. Precisely that number voted; 135 in the affirmative, and 11 in the negative.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I make the point of order that that is not a quorum; it makes only 146, which is not a majority of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement of the gentleman from New York is correct, and the announcement of the vote by the Chair was incorrect. There were 136 in the affirmative and 11 in the negative, making a quorum.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the Chair counts one.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. HALE, of New York, called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 21 members voting therefor.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For contingent expenses, namely: For rent, $15,750; for fuel, $2,500; for lights, $1,200; for repairs, $4,000; for care and subsistence of horses, and repairs of carriages, $2,000; and for miscellaneous items, not included in the foregoing, $6,250; in all, $31,700.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to make an inquiry. I find an appropriation here for rent, $15,750, and then I find an appropriation for repairs, $4,000. Now, I understand that when we rent buildings the parties owning them are required by their contracts to keep them in repair.

Mr. GARFIELD. Those changes that the Department needs to have made in the buildings it rents for its own convenience—and it has had to make a good many— it makes at its own expense, according to the contracts. It is that class of repairs to which this appropriation relates.

Mr. RANDALL. Was this item put in the bill in answer to a requirement from the Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee requested the Department to itemize, as they did not do last year, all the elements of the contingent fund, and they are thus itemized, and if any one of the items is not needed it will not be used. Gentlemen will see that we have left but $6,250 as a real contingent fund, for elements not expressed and itemized.

Mr. RANDALL. Four thousand dollars seems to be a large sum of money taken in connection with the amount paid for rent.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have very considerably reduced the amount.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of official postage-stamps, $50,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to insert after that clause the words "to be credited to the Post-Office Department."

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that that amendment ought not to be adopted. We made no such arrangement in any of the Departments. We simply appropriate the money, and the head of the Department purchases of the only Department from which he can purchase, namely, the Post-Office Department, the stamps which that Department only is authorized to furnish. Of course the amount could not be credited to any Department except the one for which it is appropriated. They must pay the sum over to the Department from which they buy the stamps. The gentleman will see that his amendment is not a proper one.

Mr. RANDALL. I would ask whether this appropriation is based upon the actual cost for this item during the present fiscal year?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say that last year we appropriated $83,000. As was said in the House at the time, the Department could not tell with any great accuracy how much would be needed, and they estimated roughly by weighing the mails for a week that it would require about $83,000. The experience of the year has shown the State Department that $50,000 will be sufficient instead of $83,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me a single question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is, why should we pay anything more than it costs to print the stamps which the Department requires? I do not understand why we should appropriate the sum of $50,000 to pay for official stamps when all they cost the Government is fifteen cents a thousand. Probably three or four hundred dollars would pay, and more too, all that it costs to print the necessary amount of stamps for this Department. But here we are loading our appropriation bills with large sums, making it appear as though we were expending a large amount of money, when we merely take the money out of one pocket and put it into the other. That is called republican extravagance, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The suggestion of the gentleman is a good one with this exception: last year, in obedience to the act of Congress repealing the franking privilege, we made an appropriation which apparently swelled the expenses of the Government by $1,865,000. And to cut down the appropriation here would leave the expenditures of last year relatively very much greater than they really were. And there is another thing: this only amounts to charging each Department with its own expenses in this respect, instead of requiring the Post-Office Department to furnish the other Departments with official stamps at their mere cost, while the people are compelled to purchase the stamps that they use at their face value. We simply say that each Department shall pay the face value of the stamps it may use, as the people are obliged to do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the Departments pay what the stamps actually cost the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. We may as well meet this question right here. The effect of this item of appropriation is to make a false showing against every Department but the Post-Office Department, and it gives the Post-Office Department an entirely undue credit. Therefore I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is right, if he can arrive at the point, that each Department ought to pay only the actual cost of preparing these stamps, and compel the Post-Office Department to furnish them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out "$50,000" and to insert in lieu "$500."

Mr. RANDALL. That would be hardly enough.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is an amendment pending; let us dispose of that.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will modify my amendment so as to make the sum "$1,000," so as to have enough to pay for making these stamps.

Mr. RANDALL. That will do better.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I also move to substitute "furnishing" instead of "purchase."

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move to substitute for the entire paragraph these words:

The official documents and correspondence of this Department shall pass free through the mails under such regulations as may be made by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that amendment is liable to a point of order; but I will reserve it until the gentleman has made his remarks on his amendment.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. It does not seem to me that it is really necessary for me to say a word, and I desire to say but a few words upon this subject. I have sustained and will continue to sustain the legislation repealing the franking privilege; but I will not sustain the other extreme to which we have gone. Every business man, and every one not a business man, can comprehend in an instant that all this matter of putting stamps on the documents and official correspondence of the different Departments in order to carry them through the mails is a foolish and useless expenditure to the Government. We could save even the $500 suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] or whatever may be necessary to print these official stamps. The Postmaster-General can establish regulations so that this business can be done better and cheaper than it is now.

I know that my amendment is objectionable to the point of order suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] but I take it that it is no more objectionable in that respect than a provision of this bill just passed in reference to printing the laws in the newspapers in the various States. I hope the committee will consider and adopt my amendment, and save eight, ten, fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five thousand dollars per annum, whatever the sum may be, by abolishing this foolishness and nonsense of requiring one Department to purchase the stamps it needs of another Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single word in response to the gentleman. Of course, if the object of gentlemen is to restore the franking privilege, it will be cheaper than to purchase stamps. It is cheaper for a man to write his name on a public document than it is to go to the expense of even fifteen cents per thousand for printing stamps to put on them.

But we have abolished the franking privilege, and the House has refused to restore it. Now, if we put in here merely an appropriation to pay for preparing the stamps that may be used, that will be but another form of the franking privilege. I admit that it will make no difference in the long run, except in this: if you cut out this appropriation and the corresponding items for furnishing stamps to the other Departments, then you must swell by exactly that amount the total appropriation for carrying on the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly. This sum of $50,000 will go to the Post-Office Department. You appropriate this sum for the State Department to pay over to the Post-Office Department, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the stamps it needs; and the Treasury Department pays three or four hundred thousand dollars of its appropriations to the Post-Office Department for that purpose, and it is received by the Post-Office Department as a part of the revenue of that Department for carrying on the public service. If now you cut all these down, you compel the Post-Office Department to furnish stamps to all the other Departments at the mere cost; and Congress will thereby be obliged to appropriate for the Post-Office Department about $1,250,000 additional in the deficiency bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The aggregate appropriation would not be enlarged.

Mr. GARFIELD. The present system is to make each Department responsible for its specific amount of stamps. I do not know exactly how many hundred dollars will be required to buy stamps for the State Department according to the actual cost of printing them; nor does the gentleman from Massachusetts. I know that the stamps cost about fifteen cents a thousand, without regard to their denomination. A thousand three-cent stamps or a thousand fifty-cent stamps cost no more than a thousand one-cent stamps. Therefore if we appropriate $1,000 to the State Department to pay for printing the stamps that Department may require, we do not know what amount of stamps that Department will get for its use. But when we provide that the State Department shall have stamps to the face value of $50,000 and no more, we limit that Department in the use of stamps. If we do not limit it in that way, we have no control over the amount that shall be used in official stamps. The method upon which we are now proceeding is manifestly the best way to guard against any abuse by the Department in regard to official stamps. I hope the change proposed will not be made.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. If the amendment is open to a point of order, I insist upon having the ruling of the Chair upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I made my point not against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not want to press this amendment in any unseemly manner; but in my belief it reflects the judgment of the majority on this floor, and I ask leave to present it in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot consent to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] raises the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] involves new legislation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Ohio reserved his point of order until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] had spoken. But he then debated the question himself, and I submit whether it is not now too late for him to insist on the point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not debate the question presented by that amendment. I answered the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER;] but in doing so, I did not waive the point I had reserved.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the gentleman should have asked the ruling of the Chair on the point before he made his reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the point of order is well taken, and the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Then I desire to give notice that I shall renew the proposition whenever I may have an opportunity.

A MEMBER. You cannot do it.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I can by the consent of the House. This body controls its own legislation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that we shall have no control over the amount of postage-stamps used by the State Department if we give that Department merely an allowance to pay the actual cost of printing the stamps; but that if we give $50,000 in money to be spent for stamps, we have such control. The gentleman puts his argument upon the ground that the $50,000 is a limit. Well, he knows that it is an outside limit. The matter is left to the discretion of the head of that Department. Now, when the Secretary of State has the discretion to involve his Government in war, to carry on all our foreign relations, I think it is a rather small business for us to say that he cannot be intrusted to pay the postage of his Department; that there is danger he may run away with postage-stamps, and that the House should solemnly, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, appropriate $50,000 lest the Secretary of State, if we make a mere appropriation of $1,000 for the cost of postage-stamps, may run away with some stamps. After all, this is a matter of administration, for which the Secretary of State must be responsible.

Here is the difficulty; and I want the House to understand it. The Postmaster-General insists that all the business of his Department shall go free through the mails; and he so orders. I call upon gentlemen of the Post-Office Committee to say whether I am not right?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That being so, I do not want to make "fish of one and flesh of another."

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the Postmaster-General sends everything for his own Department free.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have understood it to be the fact.

Mr. PACKER. The Post-Office Department pays its postage just as the other Departments do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; the gentleman will find that it passes through the mails free a portion of its business.

Mr. PACKER. Nothing except such articles as are included in the term "supplies." But for the correspondence of the Post-Office Department it uses postage-stamps, just as the other Departments do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now what are "supplies?" Everything that is sent out. Every bill of lading, every way-bill, everything sent out by the Post-Office Department goes free. Now what goes through the Department of the Secretary of State? All the supplies of our consuls abroad have to be stamped. Why should supplies of the Postmaster go free, and the supplies of the Secretary of State and his subordinates be taxed for postage? I do not believe in this appropriating money and being charged $1,800,000 in money in our appropriation bills, as evidence of our great expense in carrying on this Government, when we know there in no such expense, although we cannot always get the people of the country to think so.

Mr. DAWES. I ask my colleague whether he does not know cart-loads of postal-cards go out from Springfield, Massachusetts, to all parts of the country free through the mails?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They should go free through the mails. It is high treason if a Congressman or any Department should send even a package of newspapers through the mails free, but it is exactly right that the newspapers and the Post-Office Department, which first got up the cry for the abolition of the franking privilege, should have their papers and all their supplies go free through the mails.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to it. We should say we will pay the Post-Office Department what it costs for stamps. Let the people know, first, what it costs to run the Government; and, secondly, exactly what each Department spends in money. If it is the Post-Office Department which spends least, let them have the credit of it. If it is the State Department, let them have the credit of it. This is a matter of so much importance I have ventured to trespass upon the time of the House, because it applies to every other Department.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MELLISH. Is there any good reason why, on principle, the Executive Departments should have the franking privilege to an unlimited extent, when it is totally denied to the legislative department of the Government?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is no reason why. It is only because when we do our business here—and we ought do it as other people do it—we are afraid to do it. That is the reason, and there is no principle in it. With great respect to the gentlemen who hold the other way, it is cowardice on our part. It is because we are afraid of the howl of somebody who has got a few worn-out type, and dingy paper, and muddy ink. That is the reason; that is the principle, and that is the only principle about it. All the business of the country ought to go free through the mails.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have an amendment to offer, which I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts will accept as a modification of his.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I accept the gentleman's amendment as a modification of my own.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out lines 323 and 324, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For furnishing official postage-stamps to an amount not exceeding $50,000 face value, $1,000.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot see, as other gentlemen have been able to see, any propriety in attempting to make it appear the Post-Office Department is any more nearly self-sustaining than it is. The Post-Office Department is only one Department of the Government. Whatever one branch of the Government pays to another is only a matter of book-keeping. It is a matter of no consequence beyond that. The only value I can see of allowing this appropriation to stand is to enable the Postmaster-General, when he makes his annual report to Congress, to say that he has received $50,000 from the State Department for official postage-stamps; to report that the Post-Office Department has received from all the Departments one million and a quarter, but the Government is no richer and no poorer by reason of that. It is only a trick of book-keeping, and that is all there is of it. The proposition I have sent to the Clerk's desk is simply this: it obviates one objection stated by the gentleman from Ohio. It limits the number of stamps that are to be supplied to $50,000, as they are limited in the bill. But it limits the actual appropriation for the expense of providing these stamps to $1,000. It provides for furnishing these official postage-stamps to the State Department to an amount not exceeding $50,000 face value, and makes an appropriation of $1,000 for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman to authorize the Postmaster-General to furnish those stamps.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My amendment says nothing about who shall furnish them any more than the bill does.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House to the new phase of the proposition before us. I hope the House will not be deluded into any side issues either directly or indirectly leading to the franking privilege unless they mean it. If they want the franking privilege restored, then let us restore it squarely. Let us say the heads of Departments shall write their names and we shall write our names and all our correspondence as formerly shall pass through the mails free. If, however, we do not mean that, then let us take the other side of the question, which is that the Post-Office Department shall sell these postage-stamps at their face value.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts says it does not cost any more than the printing of these stamps. I deny it. Does it cost no more to carry the mails of the Departments from here to Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does it cost no more to carry the mails of the Departments to California?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does it cost nothing to print the stamps?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The Post-Office Department is only one Department of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know that; but the gentleman is now asking us to say that the Post-Office Department shall not be credited for any carrying it does over all this country for any of the other Departments of the Government.

Now, the Treasury Department has to bear its own burden. The Treasury Department keeps its own books and makes its own showings, and we are here holding the Treasury to its work, requiring it to show what are its outgoings and its receipts. And we do the same thing with the Interior and the other Departments. The law as it now stands in regard to the Post-Office Department is that all its receipts shall be treated as revenues and all its outgoings shall be charged as such, and that we shall appropriate for the deficit here in the deficiency bill.

It was one of the great reasons why the franking privilege ought to be abolished that it burdened one of the Departments of the Government, and charged to that Department expenditures that really should have been charged to the Treasury and other Departments. If you provide that the Treasury shall carry its own mails, or that it shall send by express and not by mail, if you provide the same thing for all the other Departments, then you will treat the various Departments of the Government justly. But now you propose that the State Department shall only be charged with $1,000 expenses, while it uses a face value of $50,000, and that that much money shall go into the revenues of the Post-Office Department. Now, it is only distributively and relatively just that you do precisely the same thing by the Post-Office Department as with all the other Departments of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has not the Post-Office Department made all these contracts for carrying the mails over the railroads, and does it cost for transportation, suppose, of one ton more anything like the face of the postage? He will not say it does anything of the kind.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question. I wish to ask if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does not know it to be a fact that this entire system of legislating for the Departments, instead of for the Government generally, is a system vicious in its nature, so that the head of any Bureau or Department cares not what he saves to the general Treasury, provided he can make a good showing for the Department or Bureau to which he belongs, and that this entire system promotes that? Take the Quartermaster's Department; it does not care what it saves to the War Department, provided the Quartermaster can make a good showing of the disbursements assigned to him. So with the Commissary Department. So with every other Bureau of the War Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is very true, and that is the reason why I want each Department to be compelled to stand on its own merits. The gentleman cannot consolidate departments into a government. We have a government consisting of departments, and the expenses of the Government are the aggregate expenses of the Departments.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations raises a false and improper issue. There is no analogy at all between the franking privilege and what is proposed here. On the contrary, my judgment is that every Department of the Government shall be allowed to pass public matter pertaining to that Department free through the mails, for, if this is not done, the Government is charged unnecessarily with the expense of printing the stamps. It is merely robbing Peter to pay Paul. And, in addition to that, I find an appropriation under this head for the State Department of $50,000, and find no appropriation for the same purpose for the Post-Office Department itself in this very bill. Why is that? If each Department is to go upon its own showing, why is there not embraced in this bill a clause making a similar appropriation for stamps for the Post-Office Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. We have put these appropriations into separate bills. We have put an appropriation for the War Department in the Army bill. We have put an appropriation for the Navy Department in the Navy bill. We have made appropriations in those bills for stamps for those two Departments. We make the appropriation for this purpose for the Post-Office Department in the post-office bill; and now, after passing three of our bills——

Mr. RANDALL. You have not passed the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. But that appropriation is in the bill which is now being prepared for the purpose of being passed; and in regard to the two other Departments I have named, those appropriations are made in the bills which have been already passed. And I hope gentlemen will not now, after those appropriations have been made, insist on changing the policy in regard to this Department.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, there were—ayes 89, noes 47; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Is further count insisted on?

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on further count.

The CHAIRMAN. Further count being insisted on, it is the duty of the Chair to order tellers. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, and the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. WILLARD, will act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 89, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Secretary's Office:

For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000; two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $3,500 each; chief clerk and ex officio superintendent of the Treasury building, $3,000; seven clerks, namely, of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriations, of Revenue Marine, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, and of the Independent Treasury, at $3,000 each; seven principal clerks, at $2,400 each; twenty-five clerks of class four; two disbursing clerks, at $2,500 each; twenty-six clerks of class three; twenty-one clerks of class two; eighteen clerks of class one; thirty-one female clerks, at $900 each; eleven messengers; and eleven laborers; one clerk of class four and one clerk of class one, to assist the chief clerk in superintending the building; one captain of the watch, $1,400; one engineer, $1,600; one machinist and gas fitter, $1,200; one storekeeper, $1,400; sixty watchmen, at $720 each, and, additional to two of said watchmen, acting as lieutenants of watchmen, $280 each, in addition; twenty-five laborers, at $720 each; one assistant engineer, $1,000; nine firemen, at $720 each; ninety charwomen, at $180 each; in all, $339,500.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to what seems to be an improper discrimination. The Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury are given $3,500 each, while the Supervising Architect, further on in the bill, is given $4,000. I think the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries ought to be raised to $4,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire in the first place to offer certain amendments which I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move.

Mr. BECK. I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order upon the paragraph which has been read that it embraces new legislation.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not new legislation.

Mr. BECK. I claim that there is no law for the appointment of all these heads of Bureaus in the Treasury Department.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no law for them.

Mr. BECK. I make that point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no new legislation in the paragraph, and if there were, there was permission given to make whatever new legislation was required to change the entire system of paying out the national-loan fund; and part of the clause relates to that.

Mr. BECK. I know it does.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no change here such as the gentleman suggests in the way of creating offices.

Mr. BECK. I have in my hand a report made by the gentleman from Ohio, No. 139, and on page 54 of that report he gives the laws authorizing bureau officers, and I do not find more than half in that report that are included in this clause. There are very many provided for here which are not mentioned there.

Mr. GARFIELD. But there is no bureau mentioned in the paragraph which has been read.

Mr. RANDALL. O yes, there is; at least it provides for what are bureau officers.

Mr. BECK. They are called clerks.

Mr. GARFIELD. If any point of order is to be made, let the gentleman from Kentucky please reserve the right to make it, and allow me first to offer the amendments which I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer to this paragraph.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The right to raise the point of order is reserved by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer to this paragraph three amendments; one is merely verbal. It is on line 336, to change the word "clerk" to "clerks;" so that it will read:

Two disbursing clerks, at $2,500 each.

That amendment is merely verbal, and I suppose no one will object to it. The next amendment is in line 330, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "2,500;" so that it will read:

Chief clerk and ex-officio superintendent of the Treasury building, $2,500.

The other amendment is in line 333, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500;" so that it will read:

Seven clerks, namely, of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriations, of Revenue Marine, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, and of the Independent Treasury, at $2,500 each.

These amendments I am instructed to offer by the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to state for the information of the Committee of the Whole the difficulties with which the Committee on Appropriations were confronted when they came to the Treasury Department, and I will confine the remarks I shall make and the statistics I shall present to this paragraph alone which has been read.

At the present moment there are employed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury—I do not mean in the Department generally, but I mean in the Secretary's office proper, the office for which we are now appropriating—two classes of employés: first, persons appropriated for in the annual appropriation bills, as in the bill before us; and second, persons who are designated to serve in his office by the Secretary himself under the provisions of an act to appropriate 1 per cent. for the expenses of the national loan and for carrying on that Department of the Government. Under the first head there are now serving in the Treasury Department three hundred and fifty-one persons, and under the second head one hundred and sixty-seven persons; in other words, we have more than five hundred, very nearly six hundred clerks, messengers, laborers, watchmen, and other employés in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, one hundred and sixty-seven of whom are employed under this fund for the support of the national loan. As with similar numbers in other offices of the Treasury Department, we have determined to sweep these away; not that we can make a reduction of that amount, but that we can put them in the regular appropriation bills. We have separated the two classes in this bill, and on the sixty-sixth page gentlemen will find the appropriation for the branch of service in the Secretary of the Treasury's office now provided for under this general fund appropriated, so that the paragraph now under consideration and the paragraph found on the sixty-sixth page, taken together, provide for the different sets of persons now authorized under this bill, if it becomes a law, in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. As the matter now stands, in the current fiscal year there are paid out of our appropriations made here annually and out of the loan fund for the force in the Secretary's office sums which, taken together, amount to $634,568. That is the amount now being paid for the force employed in the Secretary's office.

This is a large sum, and the committee have believed that it ought to be very largely reduced. They have proposed to reduce the number of clerks of various classes, so as to reduce the amount required to $468,733.50, or a reduction of $165,834.50 in the cost of maintaining the force in the office of the Secretary. We have cut it down both in numbers and in rates: in some cases we have cut down the rates largely, in others to but a little degree; but on the whole we have made no increase.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. How much less is appropriated for the chief clerks of these Bureaus, as they are called?

Mr. GARFIELD. We have arrived at the most important part of this bill, the part on which the Committee on Appropriations spent certainly not less than twenty days' work to accomplish what they believed to be a great and needed reform. We found that there had been growing up in this office of the Secretary of the Treasury a group of so-called bureaus not known to the law, but a group which the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to make so far as the mere grouping together of a number of clerks was concerned; that is, assigning to one set of clerks one particular duty, to another set of clerks another duty, and giving the different sets separate rooms under these several heads. It seemed to the committee that there was a larger number of these groups than ought to have been made. There were some twelve of them known by special names, such as Warrant, Appointment, Stationery, Revenue Marine, Customs, Navigation, Internal Revenue, Independent Treasury, Mail, Records and Files, and one or two more which I do not now remember. In that way there are grouped a large number of clerks. And under the power given to the Secretary to pay out of the national-loan fund he was not limited as to the amount of salaries to be paid to them.

If gentlemen will turn to a book known as the Treasury Register, a book not in general circulation, they will find that in the office of the Appointment Bureau, as it is called, there are twenty-two clerks. The head of that Bureau receives $3,000, his assistant receives $2,400, and the other clerks receive $1,800, $1,600, $1,400, and $1,200, according as they are graded, and the messengers receive lower figures. This includes the extra compensation given from what is known as the distributive fund, which has been voted for several years by Congress; the $22,500 which has appeared in our appropriation bills for several years, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay additional salary to such important clerks as he thought should receive it.

There is then a Warrant Division or Bureau, in which are twenty clerks. The officer at the head of that Bureau receives $3,000 and his assistant $2,000. Here is the Bureau of the Independent Treasury, the head of which gets $3,000, and his assistant $2,400; and there are nineteen clerks in that Bureau. In the Customs Bureau there are seventeen clerks, and the head of the Bureau and his assistant receive the same compensation as in the Bureau of the Independent Treasury. The Revenue Marine has nine clerks, and two principal clerks, receiving the same pay as in the other Bureaus. The Bureau of Navigation has eight clerks, the chief and his assistant receiving the same pay as other chiefs and assistants. Here is the Internal Revenue Bureau with ten clerks, the Stationery Bureau with seventeen clerks, the Bureau of Captured and Abandoned Property with six clerks, the Bureau of Mails with thirteen clerks, the head of which receives $3,000. Then there is the Bureau of Record and Files with forty-one clerks, the head of which receives $3,000.

If it were not for two things in the law none of these clerks would receive more than the extreme limit allowed to the other clerks, that is $1,800 a year. But under the two provisions of law to which I have referred they have been for several years receiving the rate of compensation I have named.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BECK. If I am recognized by the Chair on my point of order, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to finish his statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. I submit a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Except by unanimous consent the gentleman from Ohio cannot have more than five minutes. The rule distinctly provides that each amendment shall be open to debate five minutes for and five minutes against.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman can proceed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want to say one word. I do not object to the gentleman from Ohio continuing, if I can be recognized for five minutes to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I object to any bargain of that sort being made.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I raise the question of order, that no gentleman on this floor can raise a point of order and obtain the floor upon it, and yield the five minutes which belong to the opponents of the pending amendment to a gentleman who has been advocating it. I am willing that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] shall have an opportunity to be heard, and they usually do have it; but I insist upon my right to be heard also.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a point of order. Did the Chair recognize the gentleman from Kentucky as entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did.

Mr. DAWES. Then under the rules cannot the gentleman yield to whom he pleases?

Mr. KELLOGG. Can he under a point of order obtain the floor and yield to another gentleman to support an amendment?

Mr. DAWES. The rule says that any gentleman obtaining the floor can yield to whom he pleases for the purpose of explaining the pending measure.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is the point of order debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was recognized, and has yielded his five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. RANDALL. I understood that unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from Ohio to go on.

Mr. GARFIELD. Objection was made by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not object. I wish the gentleman would correct that statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, Mr. Chairman, not in the spirit of debate, but to give the Committee of the Whole the information which the Committee on Appropriations have tried to gain, I wish to say that all I have been describing here had grown up under two provisions of law. One was in the annual appropriation bills granting sums for distribution by the Secretary of the Treasury. That custom began away back soon after the close of the war, in the days of Secretary McCulloch. We at one time appropriated over $300,000 to be distributed by Secretary McCulloch as additional salary to such valuable clerks as he considered deserving of an extra allowance. The object was to prevent the necessity of raising generally the salaries in the Treasury Department. By degrees, as the expenses of the war passed away, we decreased that appropriation, and for the last four or five years we have granted only two sums—$22,500 to be distributed by the Secretary of the Treasury to persons in his office, and $8,500 to be distributed by General Spinner to the clerks in his office. From this source there have been these increases of salary. Now there has been one other source of such allowances. By the act of May, 1872, and previous acts of the same character, the entire expense of the national loan, including the printing of notes, bonds, fractional currency—all that is done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and all that is done in handling the bonds and notes and keeping the record of them—is appropriated for by a permanent appropriation to the extent of 1 per cent. of the whole amount of issues in any one year. This puts a fund somewhere in the neighborhood of $5,000,000 at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the administration of that fund he has employed such force as he deemed necessary. That force is first in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where there are at the present time twelve hundred people employed.

Mr. LAMISON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. LAMISON. Are there any vouchers for the expenditure by the Secretary of the Treasury of this fund, which the gentleman says is left to the Secretary's discretion?

Mr. GARFIELD. O, yes.

Mr. LAMISON. Do they show the names of the parties to whom the money has been paid?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly. The accounts go through the hands of the regular accounting officers of the Treasury like all their accounts.

Mr. LAMISON. Is a record kept of the names of the beneficiaries?

Mr. GARFIELD. The names are on record and in print. There is no attack on any one in this matter; I simply state what our laws are. Now in addition to what goes to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, there are also employed at the present time in the Secretary's office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, one hundred and sixty-seven persons, who are paid out of the expenses of the national loan. If gentlemen will turn to page 24 of the report designated to accompany this bill—Report 139—they will find a list of all the clerks and employés in the several offices who are paid out of this fund. They will see that there are one hundred and sixty-seven persons in the Secretary's office who receive in the aggregate $175,425 a year. There are two hundred and forty persons employed in the office of the Treasurer, General Spinner, receiving in the aggregate $238,768 annually. There are employed in the Register's office one hundred and seventy-three persons, who receive $186,100 a year; and there are sixteen persons in the First Auditor's office, receiving in all $24,440 a year.

In the sections now under consideration we have made the ordinary appropriation, except that we have left out the $22,500 for the Secretary's office, and $8,500 for the Treasurer's office. And hoping that some day or other the expenses of the national loan can be dropped altogether—regarding this as a sort of temporary addition to our expenses—we have on page 66, instead of making a permanent appropriation, inserted a section repealing all permanent appropriations for the expenses of the national loan, making a specific appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and a specific appropriation for the additional force in the Secretary's office, the Treasurer's office, the Register's office, and the office of the First Auditor. This provision is a substitute for the general, sweeping, permanent appropriation of about $5,000,000 a year now made by law, and now governed wholly by the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now in the main the Secretary has used his discretion, I should say, wisely; but he has paid out of this fund some large sums. He has paid to a large number of officers $3,000 a year. For instance, one person at the head of what is called the "loan division" (this expenditure coming under the head of expenses of national loan) has been paid for several years $3,000 annually.

Out of the $22,500 distributive fund which we have allowed for several years he has paid a gratuity to those in his own office whom he considers as especially important as clerks, and you will see the list on page 31. He gave some $1,200, some $1,000, some $800, and some $600 additional. There is on that page a table called "Appendix D," which shows just the officers to whom this $22,500 has been distributed.

We authorized that ourselves; and when we came to look into the large number of important divisions or bureaus established in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, we thought at first we would strike them all out; but then, again, we thought we might cripple the machinery of the office, and therefore selected seven which we deemed to be the most important, and provided they should be retained.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The first question to be considered is in reference to the salary of the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, which we propose to fix at $2,500. I think we can get along a great deal faster if we take up and comment and act on these matters one at a time.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was perhaps necessary to make beforehand this general explanation of the whole matter.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It is proposed to make the salary of the chief clerk of the Treasury the same as that voted the chief clerk of the Secretary of State yesterday.

Mr. GARFIELD. We propose the chief clerk of the Treasury Department instead of receiving $3,000, as he does now, shall receive hereafter $2,500, and also that the clerks at the head of divisions of Appointments, Warrants, and Appropriations, Revenue Marine, Customs, Navigation, Internal Revenue, and Independent Treasury, shall have $2,500 a year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment the gentleman offers. If I understand it rightly, it is confined now to this chief clerk. I will say at the outset I agree entirely with the Committee on Appropriations that it was a matter of economy and good judgment on their part to consolidate all these offices into one bill, and dispense with what has been received out of what is called the "slush-fund." I think we ought to settle by law what these salaries should be, and provide there shall be no such "slush-fund" out of which $1,200, or $1,000, or $800, or $600 can be added to the salary of each one of these clerks,

But, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman goes beyond that and says he is authorized by the Committee on Appropriations to strike down the sum fixed in this bill for the chief clerk and ex officio superintendents of the Treasury Department from $3,000 to $2,500, I as one member here do not believe it is either good economy or good judgment on the part either of that committee or this House. I do not believe that an officer so important as this one is should have his salary reduced below $3,000. The bill as it stands, without being amended, is precisely what that officer has had for years past. We have had this "slush-fund" since 1866. It is the fund which my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] talk so much about, although during Andrew Johnson's administration that "slush-fund" was five or six times larger than it ever has been since. It was divided among these officers to increase their salaries. Beside that we then passed a law adding 20 per cent. to all these salaries. During this administration there has been only $22,500 divided among these officers, and if this bill passes, $3,000 for this chief clerk and for those at the head of the other Bureaus is precisely what they have been getting for years and precisely what in my judgment they ought to have. It is as little as they ought to have, and for any less salary I do not think proper men could be induced to remain there.

Now take the Bureau of Warrants and Appropriations. Why, sir, every warrant for the payment of money has to go through that Bureau. When the committee framed this bill and gave these men the same sum they had received from these two sources I thought it had done a wise thing. I therefore now submit it is not justice, it is not good economy to provide for paying these men a less sum than they can get by going into any country bank and acting as teller or cashier. I mentioned an instance the other day of the cashier of the Treasury who receives only $2,800 a year and who went to a bank in Omaha where he got $3,800 a year. Out of this "slush-fund" they gave him, however, an additional $1,000 and got him back again, and he is now serving in the Treasury, I believe, although he can command five or six thousand a year in any of twenty-five national banks in the country.

Now I do not believe in any general increase of salaries. I say keep the great body of your clerks at their present salaries. Give them $1,800 or $1,600 or $1,400 or $1,200 a year as now. But, sir, you must have a few men in important positions where millions of bonds and currency go through their hands every year, and you ought to keep men in these positions of sufficient capacity to command a salary of over $3,000 a year, and the sum ought to be sufficient so as to make it an inducement for subordinates to aspire to fill the higher positions when they become properly qualified.

I may say once for all that in my judgment so far as regards the men who fill the important places in the Department, who require to be men of high honor and of high ability, you ought to put them beyond the reach of temptation; you ought to give them salaries which will support them from year to year and enable them to support their families with no temptation to anything in the shape of pilfering or dishonesty. It is not good economy, it is not good civil service reform to cut down the salaries of the men filling these important positions.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question in regard to the text of the bill, whether the appropriations made in the bill for the seven clerks of appointments, &c., at $3,000 each, of seven principal clerks at $2,400 each, of two disbursing clerks at $2,500 each, are the sums that have been paid under the national loan act heretofore to those clerks?

Mr. GARFIELD. These men are getting the precise sums put down here. I am not sure but we are going too far in cutting these amounts down as is now proposed. It was the opinion of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations that we should do it, and I am faithful to them in reporting their decision.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend by striking out "$339,500," at the end of the paragraph, and make the amount "$300,000."

I wish to say that if the committee will pay attention, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations asks them to do, to this portion of the bill, they will see that it involves a more radical change, a change more important than any other made or suggested in the whole bill. Yet I doubt whether ten members of the House know or care anything about it. We have been allowing $22,500 annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be disposed of as the Secretary saw fit, for additional service or additional compensation to meritorious officers in his Department, assuming, of course, that the Auditors, Comptrollers, and their clerks would be the recipients of it in proper proportions; but we have been mistaken in our assumption. Not one dollar of it has ever got outside of the Secretary's office. The Comptrollers, the Auditors, and their chief clerks, men who are doing three times the amount of work that the bureau officers inside the Secretary's office are doing, have never received a dollar of increased pay. All has gone to the favorites hanging around the office of the Secretary himself, acting as his chiefs of staff, without warrant of law; and now, even in this bill of the committee, it is proposed to pay the chief clerks and their assistants in the little fancy bureaus established there in violation of law, $2,500 and $3,000 a year, when the chief clerks in the offices of the different Auditors and Comptrollers, having some of them ten times as many men under their control, twice as much to do and ten times the responsibility, are to be paid only $2,000 a year. I am opposed to all such legislation, and to the encouragement of a swarm of useless retainers to give pomp and mock dignity to the office of Secretary, while the real workers in the Comptrollers' and Auditors' offices are overworked and badly paid. The blunder is in keeping up a useless force. I do not object to paying good salaries to officers we really need, whose places are provided for by law and whose duties are legally defined.

There has been a system of favoritism and corruption in these things about which this Congress has never known enough. The bill of the committee is in the right direction. I approve its design as far as it goes, but it does not approach doing what ought to be done and what the House ought, if we have the time to consider and understand it, require to be done. It does, however, cut off this floating fund, which has been simply applied to pay favorites and pets of the Secretary.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] called me to task some weeks ago when I said that in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury they were organizing bureaus and paying extra salaries to an extent unknown before. He rose in his place to say that in 1869 they were doing worse than they are now. I said that might be true. The gentleman's party were responsible for all the legislation then as much as now. But I have taken pains to have the matter investigated since then by a gentleman who is generally accurate, and I hold in my hand what I believe is an accurate statement of the amounts paid to officers in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. In 1869 it amounted to $63,300. And for the same set of officials in that office in 1873–'74 we are paying $146,400, an excess of $83,100 over what was paid then. I desire to have the statement in full incorporated with my remarks. It is as follows:

Chief clerk of Treasury	$2,700
Disbursing clerk	2,500

My only object in setting forth this statement in detail is that its accuracy may be tested. I had it made up, as I said, by a man who knows pretty well what he is about. Turn to the report of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] accompanying this bill, and gentlemen will see what is done with the $22,500 which is put in the Secretary's hands to reward meritorious officers. You will find that every dollar of that $22,500 goes into the hands of a few men whom he has around him.

His statement of it is as follows:

Now, turn to your Blue-Book for this year, and instead of the ten Bureaus which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] told us were now in existence in the Secretary's office, what do we find? We find Chief of Appointments, one; chief clerk in Warrant Bureau, two; Independent Treasury, three; Customs, four; Revenue Marine, five; Navigation, six; Internal Revenue—they keep a little machine of that kind there it seems; Sanborn I suppose heads it—seven; Stationery and Printing, eight; Captured and Abandoned Property, nine; Special Agent Madge's Bureau, ten; Supervising Architect, eleven; Marine Hospital, twelve; Inspection of Steamboats, thirteen; Statistics, fourteen; Mint, fifteen; Mail, sixteen; Records and Files, seventeen; Loans, eighteen; Miscellaneous Duty, nineteen; Currency, twenty; Engraving and Printing, twenty-one; Light House, twenty-two; with several others. I confess there are more than I suspected.

I will quit counting. Little wonder the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has to admit that $160,000 a year can be lopped off from this office alone, and still pay them all more than any other officers get.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to say one word. Only twelve of them are in the Secretary's office. I have the list here; the others are outside, and the gentleman ought to know it; they are not in the Secretary's office at all.

Mr. BECK. They are put down in the Blue-Book as the Bureaus of the Secretary's office. The gentleman has the Blue-Book before him and can see it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand all that; there are twelve now where there were twenty-three under Johnson's administration.

Mr. BECK. Here is the Secretary's own book, and in it are all these things put down as part and parcel of the Secretary's office. The statements made in that official record are true, or this is another fraud and deception. The gentleman from Connecticut must have been greatly misled, or have been deceiving us, when he said that more money was expended in 1869 in the Secretary's office than now.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the gentleman charge me with fraud?

Mr. BECK. O no, my dear sir. If I said anything of that kind it was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. KELLOGG. I say that there are twelve Bureaus now, instead of twenty-three as under Johnson's administration, and that does not include the Light-house Board.

Mr. BECK. Look at the Blue-Book; it shows all the facts. The portion of it I read from runs from page 28 to page 41. It is the book just published, and furnished by the Secretary himself. Can nothing be believed which comes from official sources?

I want to say another thing. The gentleman from Ohio said just now that 1 per cent. retained out of the national loan amounted to $2,800,000 this year, and, as I understood him, he says that that money was in part used to pay these officials in the Secretary's office and in part to pay those employed in the Loan division.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. I desire to say one word more. I find in the gentleman's report that the expenses of the national loan are put down at $2,000,000, all paid to outside parties, if I am not mistaken. I would like some explanation of that. On page 26 of his report the expenses are given as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Hobbs is the disbursing clerk; he keeps the pay-rolls.

Mr. BECK. There is an item to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and another to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, others to express and bank-note companies, and another to B. Birch, $640,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Birch and Hobbs are the two disbursing clerks who pay the force employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. BECK. There is an item of $301,484.29 to the American Bank-Note Company, and an item of over $250,000 to the National Bank-Note Company.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bank-note companies do the printing of the notes in New York, and of course they are paid.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Before offering an amendment I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair as to the existing state of the amendments pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There are three amendments pending, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] being one more amendment than the rules permit.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio submitted those amendments as one; they are substantially one amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. They are really a part of the same thing, and I offered them as the same amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then they will be treated as one amendment.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I then offer an amendment to the amendment to insert after the word "each," in line 339, the following:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this bill shall be used to pay male employés more than is paid to female employés for like services.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment that it changes the existing law.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. No; it does not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the point of order. It is a restriction on the appropriation made in this bill and does not change the general law.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. If the amendment is understood by the committee I do not desire to say a word in support of it. It possesses the elements of equity, justice, and fair dealing, and especially when it appeals to the stronger of the human family, it seems to me that it need not be argued at all. It merely proposes that like services shall be paid for at like rates.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to know if the gentleman means by his amendment to say that the five or six hundred ladies now employed in the Treasury Department shall all have their pay raised?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. If the proposition meets with the approval of the House it can be perfected. I am not sufficiently versed in all the legislation concerning clerks to be able to frame it as it perhaps ought to be; but the idea contained in the proposition I think everybody comprehends, and it is simply that like services shall be paid for at like rates whether performed by males or females.

Mr. KELLOGG. I agree with the gentleman in that, and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service have inserted such a provision in their bill reorganizing the Department.

Mr. NIBLACK. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois who offers this amendment, that much of the discrimination made in the rates of compensation paid to male and female labor in the Departments is unjust, and that some remedy ought to be applied, but I do not think the House is prepared to make the change which the gentleman suggests by his amendment, and therefore I oppose it pro forma. I do believe, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] and also of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to this view of the case, that there ought to be classes of female clerks the same as there are of male clerks. I think the greatest injustice is done by placing the pay of all the female clerks on the same dead level of $900. I think there ought to be promotions among them. I think there ought to be grades according to the difference in the capacity of the clerks and the character of the work they perform, just as there are among the male clerks. If a proposition of that sort should be brought before the House I should support it very cordially, believing that the present arrangement operates unjustly to the female clerks.

But what I have sought the floor for more especially at this time is to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] for a moment to this subject. It was stated to me a short time ago, by a gentleman who seemed to be well informed, that the Committee on Revision of the Laws, in seeking to revise the laws for the organization of the Treasury Department, could not ascertain the authority for the employment by that Department of more than four hundred clerks, and that all the rest there employed were so employed upon some construction of the law or outside of any real existing law. I want to know whether in that matter the facts have been correctly reported or not. If so, then I would call the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the chairmen of all the committees that have anything to do with this matter to this very remarkable condition of things.

Mr. POLAND. In endeavoring to revise the laws in relation to the persons employed in the Department, our business was to find what provision there was by permanent law establishing the clerkships in the Department. We were not able to find any statutes of a permanent character that provided for more than three or four hundred clerks in the Treasury Department, while there were twenty-five hundred or more employed there. But they were all employed by virtue of annual appropriations made by Congress. They were not employed without authority of law, but by virtue of these temporary appropriations that are made from year to year. So far as we have been able to discover, none of the employés of the Department are employed without authority of law.

Mr. NIBLACK. But without any system whatever.

Mr. POLAND. That is, any system provided by law.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I wish to make a single suggestion. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has proposed three amendments. The first is one reducing the salary of the chief clerk. He is now receiving $5,300 a year. This bill as reported gives him $3,000, and the amendment is to reduce the sum to $2,500, the same as we give the chief clerk of the State Department. I understand that there is no objection to that. We have these three amendments proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; and I believe that courtesy generally requires that amendments from the committee shall be first voted upon. An amendment has also been proposed by another gentleman referring to the compensation of female clerks. We cannot vote on four different amendments at the same time. But as there is no objection to the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio in relation to the salary of the chief clerk, I will suggest that we dispose of that at once.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to facilitate the dispatch of business, the Chair will regard the amendments of the gentleman from Ohio as separate amendments. As the rule does not permit more than two amendments to be pending at the same time, one of those amendments must therefore be withdrawn. The first question will be upon the proposition to reduce the salary of the chief clerk.

Mr. RANDALL. As this subject of the employment in the Treasury Department of clerks without authority of law has been alluded to, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and also of the members of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to the fact that by this bill it is proposed to pay for the employment of eight hundred and sixty-six clerks in the Treasury Department without authority of law. I will show how I reach that conclusion. I take the report of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, No. 139, on page 68, of which will be found a recapitulation. I take his own statement for my authority as to the number of clerks allowed by law to be employed in the Treasury Department. Then I take the number provided for in this appropriation bill, and, as I said before, I find that there are eight hundred and sixty-six clerks provided for in this bill without any authority of law.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is just what we are trying to remedy by the bill reported from our committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to show the enormity of thus acting without authority of law in these various appropriation bills. I could not restrain myself from taking this opportunity of calling attention to this fact when attention has been called to this subject. And the same thing will be found as we go from one Department to another. It is so with the Interior Department, in which it is proposed to employ five hundred and eleven clerks without authority of law.

Now, this may have been excusable, and perhaps necessary and commendable in time of war, when everything was heels over head, when we were in the hours of trial. But there is no excuse for continuing it now. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] will at an early day report to this House some remedy for this thing.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now let us have a vote on the amendment in relation to the chief clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word before that is done. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is to put the salary of the chief clerk at the same it is now by law, that is, $2,200 as clerk and $300 additional for superintending the Treasury building.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is now $3,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. By law it is now $2,200 with $300 added for acting as superintendent of the Treasury building. That is his salary as now fixed by law. Up to 1870 the salary of this chief clerk was $2,200. Now, if the only expense of superintending the Treasury building was to be the additional $300, I should not be inclined to complain of it; but the gentleman from Ohio has incorporated a new feature in this bill. I ask the Clerk to read lines 340 and 341 of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

One clerk of class four and one clerk of class one, to assist the chief clerk in superintending the building.

Mr. HOLMAN. Here are provided two clerks, with salaries amounting to $3,000, to be added to the salaries already paid in connection with superintending the Treasury building. That is to say, in 1870 the salary was $2,200; in 1872 it was increased by the addition of $300 as compensatson to the superintendent of the Treasury building; and now by this bill we propose to appropriate for two additional clerks, one at a salary of $1,800 and another at $1,200, to assist this chief clerk in performing this duty. I must insist that if these two additional officers are to be created, to be under the charge of the superintendent of the Treasury building, then the salary of this clerk should be reduced to what it was in 1870—$2,200.

One word more. In looking over the bill I find that four most important chief clerks in that Department, employed respectively in the offices of the Second Auditor, the Third Auditor, the First Comptroller, and the Second Comptroller, are left by this bill at $2,000. Now, will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] say that the responsibility and duties of the chief clerk in the Secretary's office begin to compare in importance to the country with the chief clerkship in either of the Bureaus I have named? Yet we propose to fix the salary of the chief clerk in the Secretary's office, a position far less important, involving far less necessity for integrity, at $2,500, and to appropriate $3,000 for two additional clerks not allowed heretofore, to aid him in the performance of his duty. I object to this steady growth in the number of official employés and the amount of official salaries.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This chief clerk has been receiving $2,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that was a mere fraud upon Congress and the Government. The appropriation was not designed for any such purpose. It was always understood in Congress to be for additional clerks, temporary clerks. It was brought to our knowledge only a short time ago that the appropriation of $22,500 was being used for the benefit of favorites.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I want the committee to understand that these chief clerks have for years received $3,500. This bill cuts them down to $3,000; and now it is proposed by the amendment to cut them down to $2,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $2,200. I make this motion for the purpose of reading a single paragraph; and I wish the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to tell me whether the statement it makes is correct:

The above—

Referring to these favorites of the Secretary of the Treasury—are the Treasury ring, the men who have received and are still receiving extra pay. The first man named—

That is the chief clerk—

is traveling in Europe with his family at Government expense.

The modest citizen who sends this paper declines to put his name to it. I wish to know whether it is true that this chief clerk whose pay is to be increased, besides $3,000 added for the employment of two clerks to assist him, is traveling in Europe at the public expense?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am sorry that my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] brings anonymous letters here and puts questions to gentlemen concerning them. Let us have a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not propose to answer anonymous letters.

Mr. RANDALL. It makes a very material difference whether the charge is true or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desire a vote on the amendment last offered?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I withdraw it.

The Chairman was proceeding to take the vote, when

Mr. GARFIELD said: I hope the Chair will state the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to strike out "$3,000" in line 330, and insert "$2,500;" so that the clause will read:

Chief clerk and ex officio superintendent of the Treasury building, $2,500.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, is it in order now to reoffer the amendment just withdrawn by the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, as the vote is being taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire merely to ask——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman now.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD, there were—ayes 117, noes 32.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we shall be allowed to go on till five o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] insist on his motion?

Mr. COBURN. Yes, sir; I do.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to understand whether this bill will come up again to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] to ask the House to-morrow to go into Committee of the Whole on this bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2550) making appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same; and

An act (H. R. No. 2867) to authorize the issue of certain unexpended balance for payment of expenses of board of Indian commissioners.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADLEY: A joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in relation to homestead settlers upon railroad lands, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 18, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WESHENA IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the assent of Congress shall be given to the Weshena Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to improve the Wolf River so as to run saw-logs down said river, across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in accordance with the laws of said State; provided that any damages which may be caused on account of such improvement shall be awarded as in all other cases under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and the amount paid to the Indian agent for the benefit of said Indians; and said Indians and all other persons shall be permitted to use said river for the purpose of running logs as is contemplated by the act, and the charge for said privilege shall be regulated by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin; provided that the privileges under the act may be altered or revoked by Congress.

Mr. AVERILL. That bill has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and there can be no earthly objection to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be again read.

The bill was again read.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF INDIAN CONTRACTS.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the resolution passed by this House on the 10th day of March last, directing the Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate the matter of contracts for Indian supplies and transportation for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, be so amended and enlarged as to require said committee to make a thorough investigation into all frauds, unfairness, or irregularity, if any, connected with the administration of Indian affairs for the years named, and that said committee make report thereon as required by the resolution aforesaid.

AFFAIRS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. HYNES. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the assistant sergeant-at-arms sent to Arkansas by order of the House to summon witnesses to testify in certain investigations pending before the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and now in Little Rock, Arkansas, for that purpose, has sent the following dispatch to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House:

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS, April 16, 1874.

Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives United States:

Everything in a tumult here. Telegraph office seized. Had to fight, nearly, to send this.

AARON BRADSHAW.

And whereas the assistant sergeant-at-arms is now denied the use of the telegraph wires, no messages having been received from him since the above on the day before yesterday; and whereas certain unauthorized parties by force have seized the telegraph office at Little Rock, Arkansas, and are exercising an espionage and censorship over the secret communications of this House with its officers:

Be it therefore resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report to the House what measures may be necessary to protect the right of the House of Representatives to free communications with its officers and to enable the Sergeant-at-Arms to enforce its orders.

Mr. RANDALL. It is time enough to proceed in this matter when we have full information.

Mr. HYNES. I ask the reference of the preamble and resolution to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. RANDALL. We ought not to receive that resolution until it comes accompanied with full information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presents it as a question of privilege. The Chair does not recognize it as constituting a question of privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. If it were a question upon which we had full information I would not object.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER. If it were a question of privilege, of course unanimous consent would not be asked.

Mr. HYNES. I understand that the secrets of this House are always a matter of privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HYNES. If gentlemen will permit me to proceed they can have the regular order as soon as the House disposes of this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman. It is always customary in such cases to allow a brief explanation.

Mr. HYNES. I understand the secrets of the House to be always matter of privilege. The dispatches between the assistant sergeant-at-arms and the committees of the House which sent him out under the authority of the House are the secrets of the House. And if any parties at Little Rock or elsewhere are exercising a censorship over those dispatches, it seems to me a matter of the highest privilege that the House should protect its secrets.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that this lacks the necessary elements of a question of privilege, because, if the Sergeant-at-Arms, who is the recognized officer of the House, and whose functions are very important, found himself obstructed in any way in the exercise of his functions, it is his duty at once to communicate that fact to the House through the Speaker by a very formal and very definite communication. If the mere fact that some tumult may arise when a deputy constable may be employed by the Sergeant-at-Arms in some remote town, and that that is brought in here as a matter of rumor is to be treated as a question of privilege, the House could do no business at all.

Mr. HYNES. I hope the gentleman will not object to the reference of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. On the question of unanimous consent the Chair understands the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to object; and the Chair rules it out as a matter of privilege.

DELIVERY OF CONDEMNED ORDNANCE FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs, for present consideration, the bill (H. R. No. 2907) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Concord, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver to the municipal authorities of Concord, Massachusetts, ten pieces of condemned brass cannon, to be used in the erection of a monument at the Old North Bridge, to commemorate the first repulse of the troops of Great Britain, in the war of the Revolution, on the 19th day of April, 1775.

Mr. DONNAN. If the House will hear me for one minute in explanation, I think they will consent to pass this bill. To-morrow is the ninety-ninth anniversary of the first repulse of the British by American troops at this point, the Old North Bridge. The citizens of Concord desire to erect a centennial monument in commemoration of that event; and this bill proposes that Congress shall direct the Secretary of War to deliver to that city ten pieces of condemned ordnance for that purpose. The committee have unanimously instructed me to report the bill with a favorable recommendation. I hope the House will agree to consider it now, as to-morrow is the anniversary of that event.

Mr. STORM. I object. I would make no objection to an appropriation of money, but I do not agree to the giving of condemned cannon for this purpose.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. STORM said: Under the circumstances, I withdraw my objection to the bill reported by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN.]

There being no further objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF SUFFERING IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, which was authorized to report on this subject at any time, to report a bill (H. R. No. 3029) to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and empowers the President of the United States to direct the issue temporarily of supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want to any and all classes of destitute and helpless persons living on or near the Lower Mississippi River, who have been rendered so by reason of the present overflow of the Mississippi River.

Mr. COBURN. I ask that the dispatches of the governor of Louisiana, which I send to the desk, may be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF LOUISIANA,
New Orleans, Louisiana, April 17, 1874.

President U. S. GRANT:

The unprecedented rise in the Mississippi, aided by violent local storms, has caused a most disastrous overflow. Six or seven of the largest parishes of the State are already in great part under water, and thousands of people, white and black, are without food or shelter, and in danger of starvation. The emergency is so great that I feel constrained to appeal to you directly, asking the General Government, if possible, to extend to these poor people the same relief that was given to the sufferers by the scarcely more disastrous calamity at Chicago.

WM. P. KELLOGG,
Governor of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, April 17, 1874.

Hon. J. R. WEST, United States Senate; and
Hon. FRANK MOREY, Louisiana Delegation:

Caldwell, Catahoula, Richland, and Ouachita Parishes and the La Fourche district almost entirely under water, and the flood increasing; cattle and poultry all drowned, and hundreds of families on the verge of starvation without prospect of immediate relief. Cannot the President direct General Emory to issue rations for present emergency? The State authorities are doing all possible to mitigate the distress.

WM. P. KELLOGG.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the answer of the President of the United States to the dispatch of the governor of Louisiana requesting aid, in which the President says that Congress being in session, he does not feel authorized to make now the issue of provisions and clothing, such as was made at the time of the Chicago fire or at the time of the suffering from yellow fever at Shreveport last year. The case is peculiarly one of very great hardship, and without parallel in the history of the country. Thousands of people are suddenly deprived of all that they have, and of the means of living, by reason of this overflow. It is really a national calamity in its importance. And in view of that fact, and of the sudden emergency which has befallen these people, it seems to me perfectly proper that this relief should be granted.

Ordinarily I think—and I believe that is the sentiment of the country—that the practice of the Government should be not to interfere, but to leave to the local authorities, to the public charities and the provision that comes from the general sympathies of the people, these charges. But this calamity was so sudden and so general and so great that nothing except the immediate application of the power of the General Government would meet the emergency. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY.]

Mr. MOREY. I trust that there may be no objection to the passage of this bill. The condition of these suffering people is very peculiar. It is not, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] said yesterday, a condition anything similar to that of the poor in New York City, who are there with a splendidly organized system of charities to relieve them, and with the ordinary means of occupation. Here is a people surrounded by water; their homes have been swept from under them; in many cases they have been compelled to leave their homes and get on the little ridges of the levee and there wait for the first steamer to take them off. Many of them are without the means to obtain a single meal and with no prospect of employment. They have to go on steamers to New Orleans, where they have already their own poor. The condition of the State of Louisiana and of the city of New Orleans is, as we all know, impoverished. This bill calls merely for the distribution, in the discretion of the President, of Army rations and of some Army clothing of disused patterns. I would appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to sustain us in this measure, because if we distribute some of this old clothing we will have no longer to prevent its being eaten by moths, and, as the gentleman told us, moths are very costly insects to maintain, a very costly luxury, I might say. This will dispose of that question so far as a great deal of this Army clothing of patterns not now used or issued to troops is concerned. The amount of the expense, so far as dollars and cents are concerned, will be very little, while the amount of good that will be accomplished will be very great.

I think this is an exceptional case calling for exceptional action, such as was taken in the case of Chicago when that great calamity, fire, swept over that city; and also in the case of Memphis when that city suffered from the ravages of the yellow fever. I trust there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the fact that this bill does not provide for clothing, but simply for supplies of food. I think it ought probably to include clothing.

Mr. MOREY. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will accept an amendment which was in the original resolution so as to include clothing of disused Army patterns.

Mr. COBURN. I will yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MOREY. I move, then, an amendment to insert after the word "food" the words "and Army clothing of disused patterns not now issued to the troops."

The SPEAKER. Where does the gentleman wish those words to come in?

Mr. MOREY. After the word "food."

The SPEAKER. Then it would read "food and Army clothing to prevent starvation."

Mr. MOREY. I move that it be so amended as to read "supplies of food and disused Army clothing sufficient to prevent starvation and suffering and extreme want."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to hear the bill read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to direct the issue temporarily of supplies of food and disused Army clothing sufficient to prevent starvation and suffering and extreme want to any and all classes of destitute or helpless persons living on or near the Lower Mississippi River, who have been rendered so by reason of the present overflow of the Mississippi River.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the House will pass the bill. I think it is in the line of precedents and is one worthy of our consideration and action. I think, sir, the people of Louisiana have suffered enough already from the usurpations of the Kellogg government to entitle them to this consideration at our hands. I think we should extend to them this aid in the moment of their need and peril. I think if we should extend it to them, we should do something at least to alleviate their sufferings and distress.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I am very glad that there is something that moves the bowels of compassion of the gentleman from New York.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FINANCE.

Mr. BURLEIGH, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Portland, Maine, upon the subject of finance; which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO SIR LAMBTON LORRAINE.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Sir Lambton Lorraine, of the British navy.

The joint resolution declares that the thanks of Congress are eminently due and are thereby tendered to Sir Lambton Lorraine, commander of the British frigate Niobe, for his humane and generous interposition at Santiago de Cuba in protecting the lives of the survivors of the Virginius expedition, and that the American people recognize with admiration and gratitude his prompt and emphatic admonition which aided to arrest the progress of butchery, and that so long as heroism in defense of humanity is deemed worthy of honor the name of that gallant officer should be cherished.

Mr. COX. I ask to have read a letter from Mr. Thurlow Weed on this subject; and then I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The letter was read, as follows:

NEW YORK, April, 15, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: I have been anxiously looking for and expecting some recognition by Congress of the humane and generous interposition of Sir Lambton Lorraine, the commander of the British frigate Niobe, at Santiago de Cuba. His prompt and emphatic admonition arrested the progress of butchery, and saved the lives of the majority of the crew of the Virginius, all of whom, but for such interposition, would have shared the fate of their captain and comrades. Surely the least Congress can do is to adopt a resolution of thanks. I have been for several weeks intending to write you on the subject, but delayed from time to time, hoping that its fitness would occur to some of you. Such a resolution would come most appropriately from a Representative of our largest commercial city, by whose constituents it would be warmly responded to.

Yours, very truly,

THURLOW WEED.

Hon. S. S. COX.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DES MOINES RIVER GRANT, IOWA.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1142) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to indemnify the holders of pre-emption and homestead certificates, and certificates of entry and patents, upon lands in Iowa within the so-called Des Moines River grant, on account of failure of titles, and to procure the relinquishment of the paramount title of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ELECTION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. MONROE. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption at the present time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the election of postmasters by the people, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. KELLOGG. We have that subject already before us in the form of a bill.

Mr. MONROE. Then you can have no objection to this resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a bill to relieve Raphael Semmes and Sardine G. Stone, citizens of Alabama, of legal and political disabilities.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman present a petition from these parties?

Mr. BROMBERG. I had one, but have sent it over to the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. A bill of this character should be accompanied by a petition.

NATIONAL FREEDMEN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to this House copies of reports of the National Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company and of its branches, now on file, or which may hereafter be filed, in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I ask an order of the House to print the testimony taken before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads relative to the Pacific Mail Steamship subsidy, for the use of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have that testimony made complete. There was one meeting of the committee, at which the testimony was not taken down in short-hand. I do not think there is anything which greatly needs publication.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. The Committee on Appropriations, having in charge the Post-Office appropriation bill, have expressed a desire that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads should reach a conclusion on this subject at the earliest day practicable.

Mr. RANDALL. We have reached a conclusion, and so has the Senate, by declaring that the contract is null and void, and that this company is not entitled to a dollar. I object to the printing of the testimony.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent to have a bill considered at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object, and move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. And pending that motion I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. BECK. I object to that. The pending paragraph embraces the whole reorganization of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. How much time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. BECK. Let the committee decide that after they have heard the discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I will try the sense of the House on limiting debate to half an hour.

The question was taken upon the motion to limit debate; and upon a division there were—ayes 70, noes 64; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 80, noes 68.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to give notice that I will divide this time equally among gentlemen.

Mr. BECK. Give us an hour, and we will not call the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. Rather than have the yeas and nays called, if gentlemen will agree to it, I will say three-quarters of an hour.

The SPEAKER. It will take half an hour to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the limit be one hour or as much less as members are willing to use.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood that debate on this paragraph be limited to one hour.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made a special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

DELAWARE INDIANS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 2969) for the relief of certain Delaware Indians in Kansas who have become citizens, moved that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

This question being taken on the motion of Mr. GARFIELD that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOODFORD,] the regular chairman in Committee of the Whole upon this bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SCOFIELD, will please take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SCOFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The pending paragraph was that making appropriations for the Secretary's office, Treasury Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is one offered yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 333, after the word "Treasury," strike out $3,000 and insert $2,500; so that the clause will read:

Seven clerks, namely, of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriations, of Revenue Marine, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, and of the Independent Treasury, at $2,500 each.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out $2,500 and inserting $1,800. I am confident that all that is requisite to secure the reduction of these salaries from the amount named in the bill to $1,800 a year is that the House shall fully understand the nature of the changes sought to be made by the bill. Up to the present time forty-nine clerks, of which these seven are a part, have been allowed to this office, at a salary of $1,800 each. It is now proposed to divide those forty-nine clerks in the following manner: seven at a salary of $3,000 each; seven at a salary of $2,400 each; and twenty-five of class four at $1,800 each.

Mr. NIBLACK. I raise the point of order that there is great confusion in the Hall, and it is almost impossible to hear the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, from the spirit manifested in this House at the present time I should almost imagine myself back in the Forty-Second Congress on the 3d of March, 1873. Just such a spirit of indifference to public affairs as we now witness betrayed this House into extravagance as to salaries, which resulted in so strong a manifestation of public indignation that Congress found it necessary at this session to retrace its steps.

I was remarking that of forty-nine clerks who have heretofore received salaries of $1,800 each—salaries left at that figure even by the act of March 3, 1873—seven of these clerks, performing the same duty as heretofore, are now by this bill to be raised to $3,000; seven more to $2,400; while the remaining twenty-five are continued at $1,800. In other words, we are proposing to almost double the salaries of seven of these clerks of class four, and to increase the salaries of seven others from $1,800 to $2,400. I think I state the exact effect of this provision. It is simply a heavy increase of salaries; and what is more to be condemned, it is an increase of the salaries of the least important clerks connected with the Treasury Department; for no gentleman of the Committee on Appropriations will say that the clerkships thus proposed to be advanced in pay are in public importance, in the ability and integrity required for the performance of the duties, equal either to the clerkships in the six Auditors' offices or those in the Comptrollers' offices. As a matter of mere favoritism, it is proposed to single out these fourteen clerks, now receiving $1,800 each, and allow to half of them $3,000 a year and to the other half $2,400.

My amendment proposes merely to put all these clerks as to salary exactly where you left them under the salary increase of 1873. Even at that time, when you were increasing by millions the expenses of the Government in the form of salaries, you did not think proper to advance the salaries of these clerks of the fourth class in the Treasury Department. The increase is now proposed for the first time; and it is confined, singularly enough, to the officers of least importance to the Government, so far as concerns the high qualities of capability and integrity; for however they may stand on the rolls of the Treasury Department, these positions are not nearly so important in the requirement of capacity and integrity as the clerkships in the Comptrollers' offices and the six Auditors' offices. As every gentleman on this floor well knows, this extra allowance is a mere matter of favoritism, justified by no public consideration. I stand here to protest against this increase of salaries. The country has condemned it. Integrity in public affairs demands that there shall be no increase of salaries. There is no salary paid by this Government that is not above the average of compensation paid in the private pursuits of life for services demanding equal capability and integrity.

Mr. KELLOGG. After this paragraph is disposed of I do not propose to say a single word about the salaries in this bill, with perhaps a single exception. The Committee on Civil Service Reform, in a general bill, have proposed an increase of salary in certain cases, where we thought it important, not only in the Secretary's office, but also in the Comptrollers' and Auditors' offices; and we propose to ask the action of the House on that bill; not to make the contest upon an appropriation bill. But when the gentleman from Indiania [Mr. HOLMAN] says that these seven heads of divisions in the Secretary's office are much less important than the chief clerks of the Auditors' offices, I submit that he knows very little about the Treasury Department, or he never would make such a statement. The chief clerks in the Auditors' and Comptrollers' Bureaus, especially in the Auditors' Bureaus, are chiefly accounting officers; they verify the accounts; they do not have the responsibility with regard to expenditure of appropriations; while in the Secretary's office most of these heads of divisions are responsible for the appropriations expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. But the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service have in their bill made an increase of salary of the chief clerks and chiefs of divisions in the Comptrollers' and Auditors' Bureaus, for the purpose of doing justice to them as well as to like officers in the Secretary's office.

Take for instance the clerk of Warrants, Estimates, and Appropriations. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations knows very well how the work of this officer has been done during the last two or three years; better than it was ever done before in the history of the Government. There are twenty-five hundred different appropriation accounts upon the books of that officer, and he is responsible for the correctness of every one of them. During the year ending June 30, 1873, 45,853 warrants were issued in this office, involving $1,151,499,308.98. Yet the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] claiming to know something about the Treasury Department, talks about this being an unimportant office, though this man has the control of the accounts and warrants of all the appropriations of your Government and the estimates, and this is only a part of his duties. And you want for that office a man who is not a cheap man—a man to whom you can easily afford to pay $3,000. This work has much of it to be done outside of office hours. All appropriation accounts authorized by acts of Congress for the service of the Government originate in his division. A man competent for that place, and the present incumbent (Mr. Conant) is eminently so, will command a much higher salary than he now gets in any part of the country.

Secretary BOUTWELL said of this officer in one of his annual reports the following words, which I commend to the committee to read:

It is not an exaggeration to say that the head of a division in charge of the loans, of the warrants, or of the sub-treasury accounts, occupies a position in which the country and the world are more concerned than in that of the collector of customs of New York; yet the latter officer receives more than $50,000 a year, while it is with difficulty that the former is able to secure the inadequate sum of $2,800.

And so of many of the other divisions. Why, sir, one of these clerks whom you propose to cut down from $3,000 to $2,500 goes out of office on the 1st of July to take a position at a salary of $5,000. Another of them has a standing offer of a more remunerative position in unofficial life. If you want to put at the head of your important Bureaus in the Treasury Department cheap men, men whose services are not worth more than $1,800, according to the policy advocated by the gentleman from Indiana, you are taking the worst step in the direction of economy that ever this House took, I do believe, and I think the sober sense of the members of this committee and the House will so say in the future, if they do not now, that you ought to have men of character and ability for these responsible positions, where they should be paid for their services, and avoid the great temptation to make money outside of their duties. So, too, with all these other divisions. Take the revenue marine, expending nearly $1,000,000 of appropriations annually, for every dollar of which the officer in charge is responsible. He, like the others, has done his duty well, and the expenses of the revenue-marine service have been reduced materially the last four years. Here is a statement of the annual expenses since 1864:

For fiscal year ended—
June 30, 1865	$1,229,434 04
June 30, 1866	1,177,230 70
June 30, 1867	1,167,125 41
June 30, 1868	1,293,661 67
June 30, 1869	1,185,702 26
June 30, 1870	1,133,670 15
June 30, 1871	1,121,026 43
June 30, 1872	930,249 81
June 30, 1873	995,308 88

Previous to 1864 the cost of maintaining the revenue-cutter service cannot well be ascertained, accounts of the same not having been kept separate from the general expenses of collecting the revenue.

The clerks in these several divisions are not mere auditing officers like the clerks in the Auditor's Bureau, who, according to the statement of my friend from Indiana, occupy much more important positions. I hope the Committee of the Whole will stand by this bill; that the salaries now under consideration will not be reduced below $3,000; because I think such a reduction would be false economy, for which I believe the House would be sorry in the future. I believe also there should be a just allowance to the Auditors and the responsible heads of divisions in their Bureaus.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw my amendment if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will renew it.

Mr. DAWES. I renew the amendment merely for the purpose of saying that, if I understand the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] his panacea for all the shortcomings of official administration is the increase of salaries.

Mr. KELLOGG. Not at all. I propose to give these officers the same salary they have now.

Mr. DAWES. Well, I have heard no other remedy proposed by the gentleman. He dwelt with considerable emphasis and force upon the necessity of a different kind of administration of affairs; but he brings forward no suggestion in the way of reform, except that we do not pay our officers enough. Now, as I understand, the secret of efficiency does not lie in that direction at all. I do not think by any means that in proportion as we increase official compensation we secure the proper talent and the proper measure of fidelity to the public service. If there is any fault anywhere, it is not because we have not paid these men enough; for the pay is the same that they have had for the last twenty-five years. If any need of reform has suddenly arisen in the administration of either the Treasury Department or any other, it does not arise from the fact that these positions are filled by men who are not sufficiently paid. The salaries of these positions have been fixed for years; they were the salaries when the incumbents took the positions. These men were selected with reference to the position and the salary. Unless you inspire the official heads with something of the same kind of business sagacity which governs successful business operations throughout the country, you cannot make up the deficiency by adding to the salaries of those under them. There is a sort of instinct in this matter. He who is not able to select the proper man for an official place, and keep him there just so long as he demonstrates fitness for the position, cannot have the deficiency made up by any increase of salary either to himself or his subordinates. We cannot, I think, meet the demands of this hour by attempting to make the people of this country believe that the defect lies in a deficiency of compensation.

I shall vote, sir, against the raising of any one of these salaries. I shall do it because in all time past they have proved sufficient. When expenses of living have been greater than they are now, when the difference between currency and gold has been greater than it is now, when the duties incumbent upon these different officers have been more complex and varied and exacting than they are now, they were able at their salaries to discharge these duties and to discharge them well. It is only within a short time, within a few years, that these parties have been coming here to Congress and importuning us to add to their compensation. I trust this House will raise no salary whatever, but will apply the remedy to any defect in the administration in another direction and upon another principle.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I fear, sir, that the committee is not aware that this demand for increased salaries arises from an unauthorized introduction of a new element into the organization of the Treasury Department. You will find in the Blue-Book a heading, "Bureaus of the Secretary's office." This is something that no law of which I am aware has ever authorized. It is the application of that term with a view to increase the dignity of the officers; and when the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] claims that the importance attached to these offices arises from their particular responsibilities, he forgets that there are Bureaus authorized by law in charge of the several functions to which he refers, and that these clerks are intermediaries between those regular Bureaus and the Secretary for some reason of which we are not made fully aware, so far at least as the claim to this enhanced pay is concerned.

Now this bill provides for the higher pay to certain of these clerks, who in the Blue-Book are called chiefs of Bureaus in the Secretary's office, and have left others out that they may fall back to their original pay. And I venture to say that the selection has been made of certain of these so-called Bureaus while others have been left out, possibly because of their supposed importance, but certainly not with reference to any legal functions which they exercise as Bureaus.

Mr. MCDILL, of Iowa. Is not provision made for the others in the remaining portion of the paragraph?

Mr. KASSON. Here they have not the same grade or the same pay, while in the Blue-Book they all stand as chiefs. There is among them, for example, the supervising surgeon of the marine hospital, who gets a salary of $2,000. I ask why should we be called upon to recognize the artificial grade and the artificial rate of pay fixed by the Secretary himself, and not by warrant of Congress, and make it permanent in our law?

Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to say that I do not believe a good organization and effective personnel in the Treasury Department can be accomplished by your legislation unaided by the Secretary; and especially it cannot be accomplished by recognizing the increased rates of pay established by the Secretary himself. Without a real head of the Department, an intellect powerful enough to master it and to understand the papers which he signs and the mass of business that is done, you could not produce effectiveness in that Department though you raised the rate of clerks' pay to $10,000 per annum.

I protest in common with my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] against recognizing this artificial establishment of grades under the name of Bureaus in the Secretary's office, either by name or by the increase of pay that is proposed. The law leaves the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries themselves at $3,500, and now you propose to establish these intermediate clerks at $3,000 and make that grade permanent, when their pay should not be more than one-half of a fair rate of pay for an Assistant Secretary. The pay of Assistant Secretary is in my opinion too small. But the rate of pay proposed here for clerks is unquestionably too great, when you fix it at $3,000. That is all that the Auditors of the Treasury themselves receive. I am opposed to it; and I hope if it shall not be put at $1,800, as the gentleman from Indiana proposes, it will be fixed at an amount not greater than $2,200; and if this amendment fails I will make that proposition.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will withdraw the amendment, I will renew it.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I renew it. My only object in asking for an hour's debate on this paragraph was that this was the most important part of this bill, because it is undertaking, in an appropriation bill, without any previous law, to reorganize the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. That office has been allowed to run on so long that it has become, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] had to admit yesterday, an almost incurable sore. The gentleman from Ohio assured us that he could strike off $146,000 from what is now paid in this single office, and still give enough for all legitimate purposes. That admission, of itself, shows that they have been spending in that office at least $146,000 a year more than was necessary. The gentleman from Ohio further stated, and stated properly, that between the 1 per cent. fund and the other funds which were given or taken there were $5,000,000 absolutely in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to do as he pleases with; yet when we furnish him with extra money to reward officers who are overworked, every dollar of it, as the record shows, goes into the hands of a few favorites inside the office of the Secretary. This system ought to be revised. Bills ought to be passed, and they should come from the committee of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] establishing by law whatever Bureaus are necessary; and it is evident that the number of employés in that office ought to be reduced at least one-half, and the useless Bureau machinery abolished. There has been more abuse of power there, and more useless extravagance, than in any other branch of the Treasury Department that I know anything about. But an appropriation bill is not the place to do it. It is impossible in this way to legalize these illegal acts.

But, Mr. Chairman, what I complain of more even than the salaries of clerks and Bureau officers—for I believe in fair salaries—is the increase of employés. I have gone through the Blue-Book for 1861, the Blue-Book for 1869, and the Blue-Book for 1873, and I have taken pains this morning to count up the number of employés in the Secretary's office during those several years. I find that in 1861 there were forty persons all told; in 1869, which was said by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] to be worse than at present, there were four hundred and thirty persons employed, as the Blue-Book shows, and now there are six hundred and ninety-two. You will observe by the Blue-Book that in 1869 the pay of the appointment clerk, for instance, was $2,800 a year; now you propose to pay him $3,000, and give him an assistant at $2,400 a year, with more clerks than he had then, and so it is with all the other improvised Bureaus.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that there is an amendment pending, offered by the Committee on Appropriations, to make the salary of that officer $2,500 a year. We do not propose to pay him $3,000. That amendment has been pending ever since yesterday, and was debated yesterday. It relates to all these seven heads of divisions. We have already reduced the salary of the chief clerk to $2,500, and there is an amendment pending to reduce the salaries of the seven chiefs of divisions named in the bill to $2,500.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. GARFIELD. That amendment is now pending.

Mr. BECK. I am glad that the committee are willing to make some reduction.

Mr. GARFIELD. That amendment has been pending ever since yesterday morning.

Mr. BECK. Why do you call these men chief clerks when they are called in the Blue-Book and by the Secretary himself heads of Bureaus? What is the meaning of that?

Mr. GARFIELD. Because we do not want to recognize them as Bureaus.

Mr. BECK. Exactly. Let me ask again why appoint seven assistant clerks to men who are themselves clerks. Why do you give these seven assistant clerks to aid other clerks $2,400 a year each, if it is not an indirect way of legalizing the outrage heretofore perpetrated? What necessity is there for giving these new assistants? The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] says that large sums of money pass through their hands. I do not so understand it. The money furnished by appropriation from Congress goes into the hands of the Treasurer of the United States and is drawn out by the heads of the different Departments, to whom it is assigned by Congress. These men only keep the accounts. What, for example, does the man whom you make chief of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the Secretary's office do? You have a Commissioner of Internal Revenue and you have all the machinery of an Internal Revenue Bureau outside of the Secretary's office, and there is a little Bureau of Internal Revenue organized inside of the Secretary's office for no other purpose that I can see or ever heard of, unless it is to run Sanborn and his gang or others of that stripe. Perhaps it may be valuable in that regard.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the gentleman that I am going to move to strike that out.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear it. I am glad to find that under discussion gentlemen are commencing to move to strike out from time to time. It shows the importance of this debate.

Again, you are giving $3,000 a year and $2,400 a year to these clerks when, as I said before, the chief clerks in the Auditors' offices and the Comptrollers' offices, the men who have the real decision of all matters that comes legitimately before the Department, are only allowed $2,000 a year. Why did not the Committee on Appropriations put them at the same rate? Why did not the Committee on Appropriations put the Secretary's attachés at the same rate of compensation that the clerks in the Auditors' and Comptrollers' offices and in other important offices of the Department were placed at, unless it was to give some little additional dignity and perquisites to the illegal chiefs of staff that are there as personal retainers around the Secretary?

I can see no other reason. Sir, if you are going to reorganize the Department at all, if you give these men $2,400, how can you refuse to make the salaries of all the chief clerks in the Auditors' and Comptrollers' offices $2,400? It cannot be done; and therefore, until you are prepared to raise them all up to that point, you are obliged in common justice to keep them all down where the law now fixes the officials in the other Bureaus of the Treasury Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the only opportunity we ever have in this House to discuss any question with reference to the administration of the Treasury Department or any other Department is in Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill, where we are restrained within five minutes and confined within the rules, which forbid us to do anything except to vote for or against the appropriations of money which the bill proposes to make.

Now the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and almost every member of this House knows, and has known for years, that the whole organization of the Treasury Department is absolutely a disgrace and scandal to this country; that there is no Bureau, no Auditorship, no part or parcel of the Treasury Department, that is not susceptible of very radical changes and very great reforms. The gentlemen who have the power—the committee that have the power—propose no general bill for the reorganization of the Treasury Department. They allow us to get up here and criticise the items in the appropriation bill, without giving us any opportunity to vote for a general reorganization of the administration of this Government.

I do not myself personally attach as much importance as do my friends from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the mere question of salary for a clerk. I am willing to pay a liberal compensation for the duties which any officer or any clerk of this Government may render. If you confine them strictly to their duties and pay them liberally for their labor I am sure the people would be content; but the practice is to give them additional compensation. The salary which we fix here is not all that these men receive; they have facilities for money-making, and exercise those facilities under the lax administration, especially of the Treasury Department, to an extent which would astound this House if they were in possession of the facts which are in the possession of a committee of this House. Sanborn was a special agent of the Treasury Department for nearly one year after he had a contract with that Department for collecting arrearages of taxes. And there are other men in that Department who hold two and three and four places under the Government, and derive income therefrom.

Why do not these gentlemen bring forward some general scheme? Why do not they report a bill to this House which will comprehend the necessary changes for the purpose of giving us integrity, economy, and efficiency? We hear a great deal about it, but we see nothing of it, and we know nothing of it. And, my word for it, it will never come so long as the dominant party now in Congress maintains its ill-gotten power.

Mr. GARFIELD. What persons in the employ of the Government now hold two and three offices?

Mr. WOOD. It is not for me to mention names; but I will mention Sanborn as one. It is in evidence before a committee of this House that he was a special agent of the Treasury Department down to May 31, 1873, that he received a contract from the Secretary of the Treasury in 1872, and that he discharged the duties of both offices.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is that an office?

Mr. WOOD. He derived income from both; he took money out of the Treasury, out of the pockets of the people, wrongfully, and shamefully, and dishonestly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman call that holding two offices?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; worse than holding two offices; not only holding two offices under the Government, but by special favoritism, backed by special powers, and made two or three hundred thousand dollars a year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to call the attention of the committee to one or two statements made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES.] I wish to state this as a fact, that by one item in this paragraph we have reduced the compensation of a clerk who has heretofore received $3,500 to $2,500. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] while they were members of the Committee on Appropriations made a provision of law establishing a fund out of which this clerk could be paid and was paid $3,500 a year. We do not complain of that, but we simply say that when by their appropriation bill he was paid $3,500 a year, we propose to prevent that by taking away entirely what was called the extra fund from which he was paid.

Mr. DAWES. I hope my friend does not think I was finding fault with that.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. I was calling the attention of his colleague, [Mr. KELLOGG,] the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, to the panacea he had for all evils—raising salaries.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not think that anybody claims that raising salaries will of itself cure evils; at any rate, the Committee on Appropriations have not taken that view, because we have not provided in this bill, so far as I know, for the raising of a single salary. Every officer under this bill gets less or no more than before. Take these clerks; they are called Bureau officers, if you please. We have struck off that name because we think it was a misnomer. They have been receiving $3,000 a year under an appropriation bill perfected by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Massachutetts [Mr. DAWES] when they were on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. We never gave it to them.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let me tell the gentleman how they gave it to them. They provided that these clerks should receive a salary of $1,800 a year. Then they gave to the Secretary of the Treasury a fund out of which he could pay and did pay year after year other sums to these clerks, making their compensation $3,000 a year, and with their concurrence.

Mr. BECK. That last statement, "with their concurrence," is not true.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentlemen knew that they were paid that the year before; they knew they were to have that fund at their disposal, and they knew as a matter of fact that from year to year they were so paid. Yet they continued to give the Secretary this fund out of which he paid these clerks this extra compensation. They may call it concurrence, for otherwise they could not have been paid. Where was that $22,000 to go except to those men? It had gone on the year before. It went on the year they provided for it when they were on the Committee on Appropriations.

I am finding no fault with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] or the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] but I say when they provided the fund out of which these clerks were paid $3,000 and we reduce them to $2,500 or to $2,000, they have no right to complain. Every one of these Bureau officers has been reduced from the salary he has been receiving of $3,000 to $2,500, as reported in the bill or in the amendment by the chairman on the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

I say these officers are competent and faithful men. Take Mr. Conant, chief of the division of Warrants and Appropriations. The chairman of the committee knows he is no new man there. Whatever sins the Secretary of the Treasury has, the sin of putting a new man in Mr. Conant's place is not one of them. He is an old officer, and that man to-day is worth $5,000 a year. We cannot pay him what he is worth to be sure, for he is in ability (and I say it without deroga-tion to the members of this House) equal to any member upon this floor. He is equal in capacity to almost any officer of the Government. Millions upon millions of dollars pass through his hands year after year, and there has not been a mistake of one cent.

Notwithstanding this man's capacity, faithfulness, and efficiency we cut his salary down from $3,000 to $2,500. I am sorry that we cannot make it more, because he is a most useful officer and deserves more. We have, however, put his salary down from $3,000 to $2,500. They seek now to reduce it to $1,800. I say there is not a man in the House who knows him will say that Mr. Conant is not worth more than that. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, and, too, the gentleman from Kentucky, whether they do not believe Mr. Conant is worth what we have fixed his pay? He is not a new man; he is an able and a deserving officer. He has ability enough to fill any place under the Government.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will yield to me to answer his question at this time, I will say that I think he is the ablest man the Secretary has got in his office.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. He is an able man, and every one of them are able men; and they deserve, in my opinion, $2,500 a year at least, and that is a reduction of $500 upon what they have been receiving. If you put it down to $1,800 you will have to get new men who have not the experience of these men. I appeal to the Committee to treat these officers fairly. We cut them down $500 from what they have been receiving, and I ask in reference to these men, who earn their money, we will not, upon the mere clamor of somebody outside, act unwisely by reducing their salaries so low that we will have inexperienced men in their places, involving us in serious mistakes, and making trouble without end in the future. I say this salary is small enough, and in the case of——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I think he would be a wise man, if not a member of the Committee on Appropriations in this House, even if his experience were more years than mine counts months, to say that he thoroughly understands the labyrinths of this legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I may say that I have attempted by comparison between it and the other bills which have been presented here year by year for the past four years to understand why changes are made from year to year, not only in relation to salaries, but in regard to the character of the service that is expected to be performed by these officers and the names by which they are designated. From the examination I have given the subject, I am convinced that the changes attempted to be made by this bill cannot add anything to the public service or require that the performance of labors on the part of these officers shall be more skillfully done.

Now, I do not care, so far as I am concerned, about the amount of the salaries paid to these men, for I think if they are honest, capable, and diligent in the performance of the duties imposed upon them, there is not one of them who is not entitled to the highest salary named in this bill. I think the effort in behalf of economy which is properly taken by gentlemen on this and the other side of the House in regard to fixing proper salaries for these officers should also be carried in another direction, and doubtless with more profit to the Government. Here we find the gentleman [Mr. KELLOGG] who is chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform in the Government, when a bill comes up in the House, as a day or two ago, which would make the officers, whether in the Treasury or any other Department, responsible for their depredations upon the public funds, only too anxious to kill the bill by recommitting it to some committee, so that perhaps it will never again see the light.

Mr. KELLOGG. What bill does the gentleman from Maryland refer to?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I refer to the bill reported to the House the other day, and which was, on your motion or at your suggestion, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the gentleman refer to any bill reported from our Committee on Reform in the Civil Service?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not refer to any bill reported by the gentleman himself. I think it was a bill reported by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOODFORD.]

Mr. KELLOGG. That was a bill reported from our committee, and it was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means because that committee had that subject under investigation.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What guarantee have we that that bill will ever be brought back again from the Committee on Ways and Means? When it was here there was a fair opportunity to settle the question upon a proper basis.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to another fact. His committee was careful on that occasion to allow no member to rise in his place on this side of the House and give his opinion in regard to the merits or demerits of that bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I had not charge of the bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am not charging that upon the gentleman from Connecticut; but I only say that it seems to be the effort, if not the deliberate purpose, of the republican party to prevent a fair investigation into these matters, so that the public Treasury may be saved thousands and even millions of dollars.

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the salaries contemplated in this bill would be too large if it were perfectly understood that only the proper number of officers was employed. When that is rendered certain give them fair salaries, require strict performance of duty, and if they appropriate the public money to private use or expend the funds of the Government to which they are not entitled, then punish them as other criminals are punished under the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the scope of the paragraph under debate. I regret we are debating so long on the pending amendment, because there are some other amendments to be offered which ought to be acted on before the hour allotted to debate is exhausted.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the House to what the committee propose to do in the law as it now stands. In the law of last year, which I hold in my hand, we appropriated for the Treasury Department, that is for the force in the Secretary's office, $388,600.

Mr. HOLMAN. Three hundred and sixty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. GARFIELD. Twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars of the distributive fund added to that makes $388,600. That sum is now enabling the Treasury Department to employ two hundred and ninety-eight persons in the Secretary's office. The bill now before the House proposes to reduce them to two hundred and eleven. This is a reduction of eighty-seven persons; thirty-six of these are clerks, and a large portion of them clerks of the fourth class. I will state to the gentleman how that cutting down is distributed. They have fifty clerks of the fourth class. We cut them down to twenty-six, but we give fourteen of the class above to correspond with what they now have under the distributive fund. They have now thirty-six third-class clerks. We make it twenty-six. They have twenty clerks of class two. We make the number twenty-one. They have twenty-eight of class one, and we give them nineteen; thus making a reduction of thirty-six clerkships, and we reduce the number of laborers to twenty-five.

Mr. RANDALL. We raised the female clerks.

Mr. GARFIELD. We reduced them one. There are thirty-two clerks now and we reduce them to thirty-one. There are twelve messengers and we reduce them to eleven. There are forty laborers and we reduce the number to twenty-five. So that in the single paragraph now pending before the committee we have reduced thirty-six clerks, and the messengers and laborers added to the clerks make a total reduction of eighty-seven. On the 1st day of July next, if this paragraph should pass, eighty-seven persons will go out of office from the Secretary's office alone, and a reduction will be made of $50,000 in our annual expenditure in this office.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we can safely make a further reduction in the Secretary's office than is made here.

As to the seven clerks about whose pay the amendment is now pending, namely, of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriations, of Revenue Marine, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, and of the Independent Treasury, I do not know, for my part, how the Secretary of the Treasury could get along without most if not all of those clerks. He asks more. He asks us to give him not less than ten. The committee decided to recommend seven instead of ten. If the Committee of the Whole should think that two of those could be spared, perhaps the Independent Treasury and Internal Revenue clerks might be struck out. I do not believe in the policy of centering in the Secretary's office work which is otherwise provided for by law. We have an Internal Revenue Department, and we have a committee of it; and if all the business of internal revenue that has been done in the past two years had been sent to the Internal Revenue office, instead of being done in the Secretary's office, perhaps the Sanborn business would never have been known.

I hope we will not cut down these salaries lower than $2,500; and I trust there may now be a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been one hour allowed for debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us not exhaust the whole hour on this amendment,

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to withdraw the amendment I have offered and to substitute for it that which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

Seven clerks, namely, of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriations, of Revenue Marine, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, and of the Independent Treasury, at $3,000 each; seven principal clerks at $2,400 each; twenty-five clerks of class four; two disbursing clerks at $2,500 each.

And insert in lieu thereof as follows:

Thirty-nine clerks, class four, at $1,800 each; and one disbursing clerk, with additional compensation of $200, as disbursing clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that that is not an amendment to the pending amendment. The pending amendment is to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500."

Mr. GARFIELD. Let there be a vote on my amendment first, and then the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to strike out can be entertained.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the substitute I have just now offered and renew my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$1,800."

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, it was disagreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. If what has just been stated by the chairman on Appropriations be true, it is but corroborative of the opinion long entertained on this side of the Chamber that the number of offices and the pay attached thereto under the existing Administration are too great. More than once this has been asserted and shown. So far as I can remember we have received but one answer, which consists of denunciations of administrations prior to the year 1860; the design being to conceal existing abuses and extravagance. And no one has done so more persistently than my colleague, Judge KELLEY, who, when this bill was under consideration on a former occasion, took occasion to assert concerning the administration of James Buchanan that "there never had been such a season of profligacy as those same four years."

Sir, during those four years purity in private and integrity in public life were the rule and not the exception. During those years elections were free and not controlled by military authority; the freedom of speech and of the press were not abridged; the right of the people to be secure in their persons and effects was not prohibited; the right of trial by jury was not denied; no cruel or unnecessary punishments were inflicted; innocent men were not arrested by the "tinkling of a bell" and left to languish in the fortresses of the United States during the pleasure of a President or Secretary, and innocent women were not hanged.

Then, sir, there was neither unbridled taking of gifts, nor wholesale appointing of relatives to office. There were no "Black Fridays" to be inquired into; no corners in gold or in stocks to be accounted for, and no "Leet and Stocking" jobs and contracts to be execrated. Collectors of customs were not forced to resign by outraged merchants, nor were presidential letters needed as "bills of health" for exposed and deposed officials. Innumerable and unnecessary offices were not created to support in uselessness and idleness the "barnacles" clinging to the party craft, and the presence of the Federal tax-gatherer never darkened the door of either the rich or the poor.

Then, sir, presidential or other salaries were not increased, neither was the Treasury depleted by the use of contingent funds for the ease, luxury, and splendor of high officials. Our ships of war were not used as pleasure-boats, nor were the soldiers of the Republic employed as menials in the streets and houses of this capital.

During those four years a Vice-President of the United States was not in complication with infamous practices, and sent to his home in shame and dishonor. Then, sir, no man questioned the integrity of the Congress of the United States, nor was it compelled to purge itself of those who had steeped themselves in infamy by their connection with fraudulent schemes, such as were exposed by the "Credit Mobilier" investigations of the Forty-second Congress.

In those years sovereign States were not reduced to a condition of v ssalage, their substance eaten up, their treasure squandered and stolen, and their pleasant places made everywhere desolate by the hand of the despoiler. The very dregs of northern vagabondism were not forced into their highest executive and legislative positions by fraud and violence, and kept there by the decrees of a corrupt judiciary, sustained by Federal bayonets in defiance of right and justice and in contempt of the will of the people.

Then, sir, from under the very shadow of the Capitol there came no despairing cry from the people to be relieved of and protected from the burdens and exactions of the task-masters set over them by Federal authority, whom they accused of malfeasance and corruption by which their property was being confiscated, their means exhausted, and their prosperity destroyed.

In that "season of profligacy," as it is stigmatized by my colleague, the body-politic was not diseased to its core, so that it might be touched nowhere that vile corruption and festering rottenness would not ooze forth. In those days spies, informers, and moiety-grabbers were not hired and sent forth to prey upon merchant, citizen, and corporation, so that favorites might fatten on dues belonging to the Federal Treasury. Then defaulters were not screened in their peculations, or pardoned, if by accident convicted, and their bondsmen left unmolested by reason of their social and personal relations with those in authority.

Then, sir, no wild railroad schemes were fostered by the Government, by which layman and priest, widow and orphan, were plundered and ruined. Millions and tens of millions of acres of the public domain were not given away to lawless corporations without price and for no consideration, and by them used for the enrichment of "inside rings" of gamblers and speculators, who have brought shame and dishonor upon our national name and credit.

Then manufactures, trade, commerce, and business generally were not stricken as if by the hand of paralysis, and starving men and women did not march through the streets of our cities crying for work or bread, but receiving neither. Honest industry received its just reward, and bloated fortunes coined out of the necessities of the people were unknown; and in that day there were no privileged classes of bankers and bondholders, whose coffers were filled to overflowing by immunities granted at the expense of the people.

Then, sir, there was republican simplicity in official life and manners, and there was no aping of regal magnificence in establishment, intercourse, or equipage.

These, sir, are some of the things which did not exist, did not occur, and were not done, during the administration of James Buchanan, that "season of profligacy" referred to by my colleague. Did time permit many others might be enumerated and held forth for general detestation and execration. But, sir, if these things do exist, have occurred, and are done in this "season of profligacy," which has been of fourteen dreary years' duration, it is not difficult to determine the responsibility.

And, sir, of all these high crimes and misdemeanors, of all these sins of omission and commission, of all these invasions of the rights and liberties of the people, of all these outrages and wrongs, and of all these violations of the Constitution and the law, I here and now arraign the party to which my colleague belongs before the bar of the American people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL, Mr. RICE, and Mr. KELLEY rose, and the Chairman recognized the latter.

Mr. RICE. Allow me to say one word.

Mr. KELLEY. I will make my own reply to the assault upon me.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire the floor for a minute or two.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. CLYMER. I should like about two minutes more.

Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that my colleague will be allowed two minutes more.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no objection if my time be also extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have no power to extend the time.

Mr. RANDALL. We will give my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] the same time to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on the left, [Mr. KELLEY,] will proceed. The committee has no power, even by unanimous consent, to extend the time allowed to gentlemen for debate.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There is no objection to it on the part of any one.

Mr. CLYMER. I have but a word or two more to say. On the same occasion, sir, my colleague spoke in boastful terms of the material progress of these last ten years. Had I the time I could demonstrate how much in error are his assumptions and how unfounded are his conclusions. But admitting all he claims, I assert that this material progress is not the result of, but in spite of, the misgovernment and misrule of my colleague and the party with which he acts. And, sir, I beg to remind him and them, and to say to all men, that no mere material progress and seeming prosperity, however great, will compensate for the loss of virtue, public and private.

When the state becomes enervated and corrupt; when the services of spies and informers are needed and resorted to; when those in authority are regardless of the Constitution and the law, and are sustained therein by reason of the general debasement and demoralization of the people, then, sir, are we surely approaching that fearful condition when to escape worse civil evils we shall yield ourselves to the guidance of some despotic hand, which in the future, as in the past, will be found willing and ready to fix the yoke upon our necks and keep it there by absolutism and Cæsarism. Being no longer worthy of self-government, having abandoned our allegiance to the Constitution, having lost our regard for virtue and for law, our greed for gain having destroyed our love of liberty, we shall justly deserve that fate.

But, sir, I have not lost faith in the people. I believe their hearts to be sound. A season of adversity has sobered and chastened them. By sad and bitter experience they have been taught the delusion and folly of abandoning the virtues, the principles, the constitutional practices and teachings of those who founded this Government. Everywhere in the West, the East, the North, the South, and in the "imperial center" of the land they have been marshaling their forces, and the late results of their detached conflicts unerringly indicate how well they understand the momentous issues. When the general and final judgment is rendered they will surely end this "season of profligacy," and compel rulers and representatives to return to and practice those virtues and principles which abounded in our adversity when the nation was born, which sustained us in our struggling infancy, which ennobled us in our strengthening manhood, and by the abandonment of which suffering and distress, disgrace and shame, have been fastened upon us as a people.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I entered the Hall I heard my colleague mention my name, and allude to some remarks I made three or four weeks ago touching the corruption of the democratic party during the administration of James Buchanan, the purity of Mr. Buchanan's administration having just then been lauded by one of my colleague's party associates. It is a pity that my colleague is so juvenile. Had he lived in the days of James Buchanan—I mean had he lived maturely; of course as a boy he was then playing in his native county—but had he been old enough to participate in politics, he would have known that he was challenging proof of every fact he was denying. Women were not hung then, said he, alluding to one case—the execution of a woman under the administration of Andrew Johnson after trial; but he failed to allude to the executions of women by armed democrats sustained by James Buchanan in Kansas. They who opposed the extension of slavery into Kansas, though women, were subject to rape and murder by the armed supporters of James Buchanan's administration; and what is more, sir, the republican party had been compelled to allow the use of the Army to defend rapine and murder in that Territory. There was no political or official corruption then, said my colleague. Had my colleague then been in full manhood he would have remembered my old associate, A. H. Reeder, of Northampton, Pennsylvania, who was sent into that Territory as democratic governor, and like Robert J. Walker fled from the place, unwilling to be the propagandist of slavery and the protector of rapine and murder.

The Army was not then used for the oppression of citizens! Would to God that that page of our military history could be blotted out; would to God that it could be withdrawn from our memories that the republican party in vain fought out the session in order to prevent any part of the money about to be appropriated for the support of the Army being applied to the suppression of freedom in Kansas. They fought out the session and were brought back in extra session, and constrained to give the administration money with which to protect rapine and murder on the broad fields of the West.

No Credit Mobiliers in that day, said my colleague.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour limited by the House for debate upon the pending paragraph has expired.

Many MEMBERS. Go on. Go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman were familiar with the story of the material progress of our country he would know that the system of corruption in land grants which culminated in the Credit Mobilier had been inaugurated under democratic auspices in the incorporation of the Illinois Central Railroad with its enormous franchise.

Mr. COX. That is not true.

Mr. KELLEY. Not true?

Mr. COX. Not the Credit Mobilier.

Mr. KELLEY. I say that the system which culminated in the Credit Mobilier was initiated by the democratic party, and I think the gentleman who proposes to obtrude his head into this conflict was in Congress when it was done.

Mr. COX. No, sir; I was not.

Mr. KELLEY. I am speaking in the extension of time granted me by the courtesy of the committee, and I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I did not vote for that bill, and you know it.

Mr. KELLEY. I say that you were here in Congress when the democratic party inaugurated the whole system of land grants. No corruption, says my colleague! What did Jacob Thompson or his confidential subordinate do with the Indian bonds?

Mr. CLYMER. What was the report of the committee?

Mr. KELLEY. No Vice-President fled to his home in disgrace! No, sir; but one fled to the confederate lines, and took the office of brigadier-general in the confederate army.

Mr. CLYMER. If you prefer a thief to a rebel I do not.

Mr. KELLEY. What did John B. Floyd do in that virtuous era? Now my young friend, when he read the democratic history of that period, should at least have read something that had been written on the other side, to test the correctness of the statements he was about to ventilate upon this floor. What became of the Navy of the United States during that time? Why, sir, it was stolen; it was sent by a democratic Secretary of the Navy to the most distant parts of the world, so that when Abraham Lincoln became President of the United States he had but two or three small craft carrying very few light guns—I forget the number, though I once had it glibly upon my tongue. I think it was less than thirty.

What became of the munitions of war that had been stored in northern arsenals? Where, I would ask my young colleague, were they when the war broke out? They were all down South, except a few big guns which the patriotic people of Pittsburgh seized on their way, and refused to yield, although the Secretary of War had ordered them to a fort the outlines of which had not yet been surveyed. Why, sir, there was nothing that belonged to the Government that could be transported that was not stolen. The Army was stolen; it was sent under a democratic general to Brownsville and into the interior of Texas, and was not let out of confederate territory until every man was put under the pledge of a parole. There was nothing left to the Government or the people that could be stolen.

So much were the people oppressed, that, as I had occasion to state in the remarks to which my young colleague has replied, the revenues of the Government in six years, the four years of Buchanan and the last two years of Pierce's administration, ran down from $64,000,000 to $39,000,000 a year. And during these six years seven loans were made to meet the current expenses of the Government. And so low had the credit of the Government fallen under their corrupt and iniquitous administrations that our Treasury notes were hawked about at 1 per cent. a month and rejected; and two of the loans provided that they should be taken by the best bidder be the terms what they might.

I say again that there never has been in the history of the American people an era of such profligacy, of such corruption, of such dishonesty, and such oppression of the people by the force of the Army, as during the two last democratic administrations, those of Pierce and Buchanan. The gentleman says that there was no Army then and no use of soldiers as menials. Sir, since then there has been an army of a million of men; in all nearly three millions were mustered into the United States service. And there has also been an army as gallant and as self-sacrificing drawn from the South to fight them, and the usages of the camp have crept into private life. And why was it? It was because we had not Andrew Jackson but had James Buchanan in the presidential chair. When the revolution had been threatened before, we had Andrew Jackson, and when the leaders approached him he swore by the Eternal that the Union should be preserved. He sent Scott into South Carolina and our Navy to the southern coast, and the threatened revolution passed away.

But with Mr. Buchanan in the presidential chair it was otherwise. When we of the North, to whom he had pledged fair play in Kansas, went to remind him of his pledges he would yield and say that all his pledges should be redeemed. Then southern men would go to him and bluster. Then should have came the "By the Eternal!" but it did not. He cried whole bucketfuls of tears; handkerchiefs were unavailing to absorb the flow from the fountains of his emotion. His exclamation was, "Don't press me; don't do this till I am out; there is no power to coerce you; and yet I cannot let the Union go. Do postpone the war till my successor comes into office." I do not profess to give his words; but I fairly paraphrase them and give the substance. This was the weakness and imbecility exhibited at the opening of a war such as the world never before saw; a war which proves again the truth that when Greek meets Greek—when Yankee meets Yankee—comes the tug of war; a war that desolated half our country, that filled the villages and towns of North and South with mourning, woe, and desolation, with widowhood and orphanage, but which in the long future, when these private sufferings shall have been forgotten, will make, perhaps, the most brilliant page of our history, when time shall have obliterated distinctions between North and South, when courage, self-sacrifice, devotion to an idea, will be honored by the whole people, under whichever flag they may have been shown, will be remembered by all with equal pride.

Mr. Chairman, had I taken three weeks to prepare a reply to my young colleague, as he has done to reply to me, I should probably have covered all his points in detail more fully than I have done; but speaking impromptu, I think I have shown the House that he vindicates an era marked, as I repeat, by imbecility, corruption, dishonesty, and profligacy beyond any other in the history of our country.

Mr. CLYMER. I claim a few minutes' indulgence.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will name a limit.

Mr. CLYMER. Not over three minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the gentleman have three minutes, and then I will call for a vote.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] will be allowed whatever time he may require.

Mr. CLYMER. I beg to be indulged for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. WOODFORD.) The Chair, if compelled to rule, will be obliged to close the debate; but if no one should raise objection the Chair will permit the debate to continue.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I believe this has gone about far enough. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, it is the duty of the Chair to enforce the order of the House.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CLYMER. As my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] designates me his "youthful colleague," I suppose I am in duty bound to speak of him as my "venerable colleague;" and, sir, I do so the more cheerfully because I think the speech he has just made entitles him to the appellation. It is the same venerable speech, the same recital of woes, the same charges of grave malfeasance, not one of which, I assert, has any foundation. The chief of the charges which my venerable colleague makes against the administration of James Buchanan is with reference to the conduct of Jacob Thompson, then Secretary of the Interior, in connection with certain Indian bonds. In reply I say to my colleague, what he knows and should not have attempted to conceal, that of all complicity with wrong in that matter Jacob Thompson was acquitted by a committee raised by the Senate of the United States, composed of a majority of his political opponents.

Mr. KELLEY. Were the bonds confided to his care ever found?

Mr. CLYMER. To make an insinuation of that kind against a man who is at least the gentleman's peer on the score of integrity, honesty, and high moral worth, is unworthy and ungenerous on the part of my venerable colleague. I venture to suggest that if he ever should rise to an equality with that gentleman in honesty, honor, and probity, he will (to borrow an expression from that distinguished jurist, Judge Black, applied to another unfortunate who assailed the character of Jacob Thompson) for the first time in his life be able to take a horizontal view of his character.

Regarding the charge of malfeasance respecting the management of the Navy by Secretary Toucey, I will silence my colleague now and forever by referring him and the country to a speech made during the Forty-second Congress by Mr. CRAGIN, of New Hampshire, then the chairman of the committee in the Senate of the United States on Naval Affairs. [Mr. BECK here handed a book to Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. KELLEY. Who is making this speech?

Mr. CLYMER. I propose to read from the speech I have referred to, the RECORD having been kindly furnished me by my friend from Kentucky:

It has frequently been stated, and I have myself repeated the remark, that Secretary Toucey, at the breaking out of the rebellion, sent the ships of the United States into foreign seas, in order that they might not be used against the rebellion. I have stated that myself, fully believing it was true; but the investigation I have made during the consideration of this bill has convinced me that I was wrong in that statement. I find no evidence whatever to justify it. I find that Secretary Toucey was a faithful Secretary of the Navy so far as caring for the interest of that service was concerned, and at the breaking out of the rebellion there were probably as many naval vessels of war in the ports of the United States as there are to-day, and if we should to-day be called upon to furnish vessels of war, as we were in 1861, I apprehend that we should be even in a worse condition than we were then.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. CLYMER. I have but five minutes.

Mr. DAWES. I want to tell the gentleman where he can get some information on this subject. If he will turn to a report made to that Congress he will find a statement from Mr. Toucey himself, showing where every ship was at that time. That report will interest the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and he will see that my friend, Senator CRAGIN, was mistaken as to where the ships were. What was the purpose of Mr. Toucey is a matter for every one to debate, but that report gives his own statement, showing where every ship belonging to the United States was at that time.

Mr. CLYMER. I do not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was permitted to go on with his tirade of abuse for half an hour.

Mr. KELLEY. It was not a tirade of abuse; nor did it last half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. By consent of the committee the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] has the floor.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Chairman, the main and indeed the only specific charges of my colleague against the administration of James Buchanan are with reference to those Indian bonds and the management of the Navy by Secretary Toucey. These have been refuted fully and completely by the evidence of those who were in bitter hostility to that administration, and who were compelled in simple justice to acquit it of all charges touching these matters.

The vague and general allegations of wrong made by my honorable colleague are unsustained by fact or proof of any kind. Even had I the time, it would be uselessly spent in referring to them. Time has demonstrated their falsity, and after-generations will condemn the partisan malignity which originated them.

But, sir, it is with pleasure I record the fact that even the distorted imagination and vindictive partisanship of my honorable colleague could invent no charge of personal discredit or dishonor on the part of James Buchanan. I am not here as his personal advocate, nor did I design in the remarks I first made to defend his administration. He and it have both passed into history. Whatever may have been his errors or its deficiency, no man may justly charge him or it with profligacy or corruption. Pure and stainless in private, just and upright in public life, he was, sir, that noblest work of God, an honest man.

One moment more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. I have made deliberate, specific, and certain charges against the party which has been in power for the past fourteen years. I have made them with deliberation, and I repeat them with emphasis, and here and elsewhere and everywhere I shall maintain them, and in maintaining them I feel and believe I will be supported by a vast majority of the American people. To that tribunal I appeal with unshaken faith, and with that judgment, when fairly and honestly rendered, I shall rest content.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word by way of explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The House has ordered all debate shall be closed upon this paragraph.

Mr. BECK. It is in reference to a personal matter altogether.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must insist.

Mr. BECK. All I have to say, then, is that I will reply to the flings of the gentleman from Pennsylvania when I get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is on the motion to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500."

Mr. KASSON. I move to make it "$2,200."

Mr. COX. Can I speak to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair mean to say that debate has been closed on this whole paragraph? I understood that it was only closed on the pending amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was the distinct understanding that debate was closed on the whole paragraph.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 97.

So Mr. KASSON's amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a question of order. Does the pending amendment apply to these seven clerks of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriation, of Revenue Marine, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, and of the Independent Treasury, and is the proposition to cut them down from $3,500 to $2,500?

Mr. GARFIELD. It applies to the whole seven.

Mr. RANDALL. But that does not debar us from moving an amendment in reference to any one of them?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have submitted a substitute which is now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's substitute is pending; but it is first in order to amend what he proposes to strike out.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course. I only want to know that it was pending.

The question recurred on the pending amendment to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the following substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out seven clerks, namely: "of Appointments, of Warrants and Appropriations, of Revenue Marine, of Customs, of Navigation, of Internal Revenue, and of the Independent Treasury, at $2,500 each; seven principal clerks, at $2,400 each; twenty-five clerks of class four; two disbursing clerks, at $2,500 each;" and in lieu thereof insert "thirty-nine clerks of class four, at $1,800 each, and one disbursing clerk of class four with additional compensation of $200 as disbursing clerk."

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move in lines 332 and 333 to strike out "Internal Revenue Bureau" and insert "Stationery and Printing." I ask the Clerk to read a single paragraph from the report——

Mr. GARFIELD. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not the amendment divisible as it proposes to strike out and insert?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out certain words and insert others, and the amendment is divisible. Division having been asked for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the vote will be taken first on striking out.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order that a proposition to strike out one Bureau and insert another is not divisible.

Mr. RANDALL. I might be in favor of striking out the Bureau of Internal Revenue, but not in favor of putting in another Bureau not embraced in the section at all. I think, therefore, the question should be treated as divisible.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is precisely as if I should move to strike out "$400" and insert "$200." You could not divide that proposition, and so I contend that this proposition to strike out the name of one Bureau and insert another is not divisible.

Mr. RANDALL. I would also suggest to the Chair that to insert what is proposed is new legislation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule 46, on page 214 of the Manual, which shows that the motion is indivisible.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule to which the gentleman from Connecticut has called the attention of the Chair distinctly states that a motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move, as an amendment to the amendment of the gentlemen from Connecticut, to strike out the words "of Internal Revenue."

Mr. KELLOGG. That amendment, I submit, cannot be entertained. It proposes to do in another way what the rule says cannot be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule also provides, when a motion to strike out and insert shall have been put and lost, that then members shall not be precluded from offering other amendments to reach the desired purpose. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 332 and 333 the words "Internal Revenue," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Stationery and Printing."

The question being taken on Mr. KELLOGG'S motion, it was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now offer the following amendment:

In lines 332 and 333 strike out the words "of Internal Revenue."

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL'S amendment, there were—ayes 31, noes 30; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers if further count be insisted on.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it go.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIAM. I offer the following amendment:

In line 333 strike out the words "of the Independent Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move, so as to make the paragraph correspond with the action taken by the committee, to strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "five;" so that it will read "seven clerks," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I also offer the following amendment, to correspond with the action of the committee:

In line 334 strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,000;" so it will read, "seven principal clerks, at $2,000 each."

Mr. BECK. Is it necessary to have more than five principal clerks?

Mr. GARFIELD. I also move to change the word "seven" to "five;" so it will read, "five principal clerks, at $2,000 each."

The amendment, as thus modified, was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I also offer the following amendment, in order that the clause may correspond with the action of the committee:

In line 336 strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,200," so that it will read, "two disbursing clerks, at $2,200 each."

Mr. RANDALL. That is the old salary under the law?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the old salary for disbursing clerks.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment:

After the words "thirty-one female clerks, at $900 each," add the words, "Provided, No money appropriated by this bill shall be used to pay male employés more than is paid to female employés for like services."

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 31, noes 52; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Is further count insisted on?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Respectfully, it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Further count being insisted on, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. WARD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 51.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum has not yet voted. Is further count insisted on?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] will fix this so that it can be administered, I will have no objection to his amendment. And to save time, on the understanding that we may have it arranged in the House in some way, I withdraw the demand for further count.

The CHAIRMAN. Is further count insisted on?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Further count is insisted on, and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. HOSKINS. I wish to ask whether this is intended to apply exclusively to the employés of the Treasury Department?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not the duty of the Chair to explain the construction of a law or of an amendment which may be offered.

Mr. HOSKINS. I make the inquiry of the mover of the amendment.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to say that I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER, on this whole question.

The CHAIRMAN. If a quorum does not vote it will be the duty of the Chair to direct the roll to be called, that the names of the absentees may be reported to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the mean time I ask gentlemen who are opposed to the language of this amendment to agree with me to withdraw the call for further count on the understanding that the matter may be arranged in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree to no such thing. I think there ought to be a quorum when money is appropriated.

The tellers resumed their places, and having completed their count, reported—ayes 85, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out lines 340 and 341 which are as follows:

One clerk of class four and one clerk of class one to assist the chief clerk in superintending the building.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right. Those clerks are entirely supernumerary.

Mr. HOLMAN. The offices held by those clerks are mere sinecures.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, there were—ayes 49, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. GARFIELD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 90; no quorum voting.

Further count was not insisted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 339 strike out "eleven" and insert "six;" so that it will read, "six messengers."

I am advised that six messengers are sufficient.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Supervising Architect:

In the construction-branch of the Treasury: For Supervising Architect, $4,000; chief clerk, $3,000; book-keeper, $2,000; photographer, $2,500; assistant photographer, $1,600; four clerks of class four; additional to two clerks of class four, one at $600 and one at $200; four clerks of class three; two clerks of class one; two copyists; and one messenger; in all, $32,045.

Mr. RANDALL. The Clerk had commenced the reading of a new paragraph before I was aware of it. I desire to go back to the previous paragraph to move to amend line 346 by inserting "thirty watchmen" instead of "sixty watchmen."

Mr. GARFIELD. We have left that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late, under the rule, to go back to that paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment to the paragraph which has just been read:

In line 357 strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500;" so that it will read, "chief clerk, $2,500."

The object of the amendment is to make this correspond with what we have done in the previous paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that while the bill proposes that the salary of the chief clerk of the Supervising Architect shall be $3,000, and the gentleman from Ohio now proposes to make it $2,500, the salaries of the chief clerks of the First Comptroller of the Treasury and of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury are put at $2,000. These men have very responsible duties, and I wish to ask whether the gentleman from Ohio thinks that the chief clerk of the Supervising Architect has duties so responsible to discharge that his salary ought to be higher than those of the chief clerk of the First Comptroller and the chief clerk of the Second Comptroller, who have, I beg to say, more responsibility in the administration of the finances than any other two clerks in the Treasury Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will observe that we propose to cut down the salary of the chief clerk of the Supervising Architect $500. The committee were earnestly pressed to keep it at $3,000. It was stated that the chief clerk of the Supervising Architect was a most valuable business man, a lawyer, and possessed the knowledge of an expert in the business of an architect and as a draughtsman. On the score of his having such expert knowledge the Supervising Architect insisted that he ought to have the whole amount of $3,000. The committee thought that we could cut him down to $2,500 and still retain his services.

Mr. HOLMAN. But does the gentleman think that the responsibilities of this clerk are as great or his qualities of business capacity so important as are the responsibilities and business capacities of those who hold the chief clerkships in the offices of the two Comptrollers of the Treasury, through whose hands pass finally all the expenditures of the Government?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not undertaken, and will not undertake, to defend the relative rates of pay in our civil service; but I will say that the chief clerk of the Supervising Architect has been for years receiving $3,000; and what we propose is to strike off the $500 he has been receiving out of the distributive fund, which will leave him where the law leaves him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the law leaves him at $2,000.

Mr. RANDALL. His salary ought to be at least $2,500; I am satisfied of that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I want to say one word here about considerations that have come to my mind in the investigation into these Departments as to force and salaries, considerations that have great weight with me, and seem to me to be matters of importance for all to consider here. The committee, after investigating into the Treasury Department and all the other Departments, have reported a bill that largely reduces expenditures. That was the direction aimed at, because it was believed that it could be done. Now, the bill as reported originally, as it first came to the House, embraced this feature particularly; it did not propose to reduce salaries. My observation led me to believe that the thing that needed to be cured in these Departments was not to take a poor clerk here and there—I mean poor in the sense of worldly goods and money, not in the way of performing his duties—and reduce his pay and thus cut off two or three or four hundred dollars here and there, but that these Departments were all overburdened, they had too much force, and that reform was legitimate in the direction of cutting down the force. The Secretary's office was too large; the Bureaus were too large; the subdivisions were all too large, and the committee put in the knife and pruned down this superfluous force.

Now, I believe that reform in that direction is good and legitimate, and that the least harm with the most benefit would come to the revenue and to the public service by such a reform. But, sir, we are clearly in danger here, it seems to me this morning, of going too far when we set about reforming and cutting down expenditures. It is an easy thing to move that here and there $500 be taken from the salary of a poor man, because a corresponding salary in another place is as low. The trouble with that is, that while we go to one place for a comparison, and find a man getting a lower salary, you may go to another place and find that a third man is getting a higher salary. I do not believe that if in this appropriation bill, or in any appropriation bill, we shall undertake to regulate the salaries of these officers that have run on for years at a fixed rate, we will be doing fair, even-handed justice. But it is a question for fair consideration whether the Treasury Department or the Interior Department or any other Department of the Government has too large a force, whether or not it has kept up its force only to the point where the law fixed it, or whether it has extended it beyond that.

I do not mean that these remarks apply especially to the case that is now before the committee, but I think there is danger, and I hope the committee will bear it in mind, that we may do injustice to some exceedingly good men by reducing their salaries. Now, my experience from looking into these Departments quite extensively within the last two months is this, that the men who do the best of the work in all the Departments are the wheel-horses of those Departments, and that their salaries ought not to be cut down. There are in almost every corner more men than are needed, and more women than are needed; these unnecessary employés can be pruned off. They may be dropped, and thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars can be saved in this way: but when you come to the wheel-horses in each Department, my observation is that there is not a man of them who is overpaid. They work beyond departmental hours; they go early in the morning and they stay late at night; they work faithfully and steadily; they perform duties that require men of ability, men of experience, and they earn their money.

Let me say another thing. It is a cruel thing, where a man has set his house in order in accordance with a fixed salary for years and has been getting that and no more, to cut him down $100 or $200 or $300. That amount is the difference between a hard-working clerk's living in some degree of comfort and being pinched all the time, and I believe that it is pinching in the wrong direction.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Maine, of whose general remarks I greatly approve, and it is this: the salary has heretofore been $2,000. The gentleman is aware that the clerk to the Supervising Architect was left at $2,000 a year, even in our extravagant legislation of last March. Nobody is proposing now to reduce his salary.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. We had last year an assistant supervising architect at a salary of $2,500, and at the request of the Department we dropped that office out altogether from this bill and left only a chief clerk. It is proposed to consolidate the two offices; and let me say that the chief clerk received $800 last year and before that $1,000 a year out of the distributive fund, so that what is now proposed reduces his pay lower than what it has been during the last four years.

Mr. HOLMAN. That enables me to say what I desire to say. The salary of this officer, as fixed by law, was $2,000 a year. I do not refer to the distributive fund, which, as we all know, has been used for mere favoritism. But I want to submit to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that every increase of salary for years has been brought about by singling out some particular case and giving an increase, and that was used as a leverage to increase other salaries. Now when you take into account the fact that the chief clerks of the First and Second Comptrollers' offices have held their places for several years without any extra compensation, is it not an invidious discrimination to take a clerk of less responsibility and raise his salary to $2,500, leaving two of the most competent officers in your employment at $2,000 a year? Does not the gentleman think this discrimination between the employés of the Government very unjust to begin with? And, secondly, is it not laying the foundation for a general increase of salaries at the next session of Congress, and will it not occur?

Does not the gentleman know that during the present session of Congress you have increased more salaries than you have ever before done in any first session of a Congress? The increase of a salary is generally made at the second or last session of a Congress. Now for the first time the increase is made during the first session. What will the country expect at the next session?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman is mistaken in stating that this bill provides for increased salaries. This bill in the aggregate reduces them $5,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. That reduction is only by reducing the number of employés, not by decreasing their salaries.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is not in this bill a single case where there is provision for paying any official more than he has been receiving for years. Let me tell the gentleman how all this matter of increase of salaries came about. It has come about by the sanction of Congress. There have been funds provided, out of which the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer has added something to the regular fixed salary of some of these officers; not surreptitiously, not in a secret manner, but open to everybody who chose to investigate the matter.

Now, so far as the matter of discrimination goes, it probably resulted in this way: the Secretary, or the Treasurer, or whoever had the fund in charge, ascertained who was working the hardest, giving the most time and the most labor to his duty, and then added so much to his compensation, and that was sanctioned by Congress after Congress. I do not pretend to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that I believe all the meritorious officers were so reached. No doubt there are in the Comptroller's office men of ability, whose duties are important, whose compensation has not been brought up to the exact point it should be. But before we strike men down, let us see whether they are actually getting more than they are earning, and not do it blindly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLOGG. Allow me one moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion that the committe rise was not agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I might have raised the point of order that the motion that the committee rise was not in order while I was on the floor. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] will give me his attention for one moment I promise him not to say anything more to-day.

I have no desire to delay the action of the Committee of the Whole on this appropriation bill or to say anything more in regard to the manner in which I think the Committee on Appropriations are treating some of these salaries. I think, and I believe a great many who do not vote with me think, that by cutting down the compensation of these important officers to such a low figure you cannot keep good men there; that you will disorganize the Treasury Department and inaugurate the poorest measure of economy you could devise, I have nothing more to say on that point.

I want to say simply this, in regard to the very paragraph now before the committee, that within three weeks past the chief clerk, with a salary of $3,000 a year, has gone out of office because he can get a great deal better pay elsewhere, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is perhaps aware. Another person to take his place has been secured with great difficulty. But I assure the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the members of this committee that if you cut down his pay below $3,000, below what has been attached to that office for years past, he will not stay there a month longer. I know he cannot afford to stay there. This House may cut down his salary, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations proposes, to $2,500, and put a cheap man in there; but we shall see how the work will be done.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has spoken of injustice being done to the chief clerks in the Comptrollers' and the Auditors' offices. I will admit that such is the fact. There has been a distinction that should not be continued. Some clerks have been paid more than others who ought to have been recognized as entitled to the same pay. In the bill prepared by the Committee on Civil Service Reform we have put the chief clerks or deputies of the Comptrollers and the Auditors upon the same basis precisely with the corresponding officers in the Treasurer's office. We propose to treat them all alike. I have risen merely to call attention to the fact that one of these chief clerks has gone out within three weeks because in unofficial life he can get much better pay; and the man now in there will go out if, as is now proposed, his salary be cut down to $2,500.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment for the purpose of getting a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 38; no quorum voting.

No further count being called for, the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

First Comptroller of the Treasury:

For First Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,000; nine clerks of class four; ten clerks of class three; ten clerks of class two; five clerks of class one; six copyists, at $900 each; one messenger; one assistant messenger; and two laborers; in all, $67,600.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out "$2,000" after the words "chief clerk" and inserting "$2,500." I shall move the same amendment with reference to the chief clerk in the office of the Second Comptroller.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point that the amendment is not in order, because the law fixes the salary of this clerk.

Mr. RANDALL. The same remark applies to the other salaries.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the amendment involves a change of existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order ought then to apply when it is proposed to reduce salaries below the amount fixed by law. No two officers of the Government hold positions of more responsibility than the chief clerks in the offices of the First and the Second Comptroller. On examination, I find that the Committee on Appropriations have made in these two Bureaus a reduction of thirty-five clerks, involving a saving of $46,600 annually. Now, in view of the fact that we have raised the salaries of the other chief clerks to $2,500——

Mr. GARFIELD. We have cut them all down.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, sir, in all these cases the law—and I have it here—has fixed the salary at $2,200; yet in this bill we appropriate $2,500 for other chief clerks. I now propose by this amendment to do an act of justice, especially as there is so much saving in these Bureaus by the reduction of force to which I have referred. My amendment will involve an increase of only $1,000 for the two officers, and will do an act of justice which has been too long delayed. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not object. I feel sure that if he expresses his own judgment he will say the proposition is just.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt that most of what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has said about these clerks is just; but for many years their pay, according to law, has been what we propose to appropriate in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Then if we have been doing them injustice for so long, there is the greater reason why at this late day we should do them justice. I understand that one, and perhaps both of these officers have held their positions for twenty-five years.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the main object of fixing salaries is not that we may secure the services of competent men? Is there any different rule prevailing under the Government from what prevails everywhere else?

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to the gentleman's question, I will say that my rule when engaged in business pursuits was to pay men adequate salaries and thereby command their entire and cheerful service. I found that policy much the cheapest in the end.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has raised the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL,] is in violation of the rules, as proposing a change in the existing law. The Chair overrules the point of order, and directs that the Clerk read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill which changes an existing law; but it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is one peculiarity about our rules; everything is out of order that saves money to the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. I will be responsible for this as a party man.

Mr. HOLMAN. Everything is in order according to our rules if——

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that it is not in order to debate the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The ruling of the Chair is entirely in harmony with the decisions heretofore made. Everything is in order that depletes the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been ruled upon. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has the floor to continue his remarks in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not discussing the point of order, because I concede it has been correctly decided under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the pending amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am doing so with great severity. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that it is now as it has been heretofore, because we increase one salary that furnishes the excuse for increasing every other salary. The gentleman from Ohio brought forward a proposition a year ago and he provided, because some clerk at the other end of the Capitol was getting more pay than one of the clerks at the desk here, the pay of the clerk here should be equal to that of the clerk at the other end of the Capitol; and that, sir, was the foundation of the whole monstrous system of increase of salaries adopted a year ago, which justly excited so much indignation throughout the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my severe friend from Indiana allow himself to be severe in telling the truth? I opposed that increase of salaries from the beginning to the close of that measure. I have therefore been all the more particular to prevent the beginning of this increase of salary at this place.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. He will discover, if he will look over the Congressional Globe for last February and March, that the whole of that increase sprang out of some salary at the other end of the Capitol and the proposition here to make the salary of one of the clerks here at the desk equal to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not by me, but against my opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, if he did not advocate it, at least apologized for it.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend is mistaken. I opposed it and fought against it by voice and by vote, but was overruled.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that this is not any pertinent debate on my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me to proceed. My recollection is that my friend from Ohio, if he did not actually support the proposition which was the initiative of all the increase of salaries which followed afterward, at least apologized for it upon the ground that there had been a similar increase of somebody's salary at the other end of the Capitol.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all these salaries are increased in the same way. We find a meritorious case, where there is an efficient and faithful officer, and a proposition is made to run up his salary, and when his salary is increased then the increase of every other salary follows, it seems, as a matter of course. In reference to the chief clerk of the First Comptroller's office and the chief clerk of the Second Comptroller's office, I am free to say they are two of the best officers in the Government. They have held their positions as chief clerks at the present salary without complaint for fifteen or twenty years. They perform their duties well and would do so still without a word of complaint were it not for the fact that you have increased the salaries of all the others. They ask as you have increased the salaries of others holding offices not so responsible, and not requiring business qualifications of so high an order, that you will also increase their salaries. That is the ground of complaint on the part of these chief clerks. Therefore, in order to give no ground for any such discontent, I trust this committee will not increase the salary of any of these officers. You have secured heretofore the valuable services of these officers at the present salary, and I cannot see any good reason why we should not do so hereafter.

There is nothing which can be said in favor of the ability, integrity, and capacity of the chief clerks of the First and Second Comptrollers' offices which I do not indorse fully.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think this amendment is in the right direction. I am informed that the reduction in the First and Second Comptrollers' offices by this bill will run up to nearly $50,000. As I indicated a few moments ago in some remarks which fell from me, I am in favor where it is necessary to reward faithful public servants by paying them a sufficient salary for the services they render the Government. In such cases indeed I am in favor of advancing rather than decreasing the salary. I think my friend from Indiana cuts right and left sometimes without proper consideration of the effect his amendments will have, and although I generally believe he is right and support him in nearly all of his amendments, still, at the same time, I am satisfied he is not right in his opposition to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to these two officers. I think the amendment would really be a saving to the Government, and there can be no doubt that justice demands at our hands the salaries of the chief clerks of these two Comptrollers should be increased by the small amount that is proposed.

I wish to do the Committee on Appropriations justice. They have reduced the salaries in these two offices to the extent of some $46,000. Now I only want to lessen that reduction by $1,000.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 79; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 66; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to insist on a further count.

Mr. RANDALL. I mean to have justice done; or if injustice is to be done, I demand at least there shall be a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. There having been some misunderstanding in reference to the last vote, it will be taken over again.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 86; no quorum voting.

The roll was then called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Archer, Ashe, Banning, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Beck, Berry, Blount, Bradley, Buckner, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Crounse, Curtis, Darrall, Davis, De Witt, Dobbins, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Hamilton, Harmer, John T. Harris, Havens, Hersey, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kellogg, Kendall, Knapp, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowndes, Luttrell, Marshall, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Mitchell, Morrison, Myers, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, O'Neill, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Purman, Rapier, Reid, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sherwood, Sloan, Sloss, Small, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stone, Strait, Swann, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Whitehouse, Whiteley, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, stated that his colleague, Mr. BLOUNT, was absent on account of sickness.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WOODFORD said: The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, found itself on a division without a quorum, whereupon the Chair directed the Clerk to call the roll, and I now report the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call shows the presence of one hundred and sixty-seven members, which is a quorum of the House. The House will return into Committee of the Whole, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] will resume the chair.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. As it has been ascertained that a quorum is present to witness this injustice, I will not insist on further count.

The CHAIRMAN. The request for further count is withdrawn, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is declared lost.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a division.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. I renew it.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, there were—ayes 61, noes 90.

Mr. RANDALL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. BRIGHT were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 85.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Second Comptroller of the Treasury:

For Second Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,000; eleven clerks of class four; eighteen clerks of class three; eighteen clerks of class two; seven clerks of class one; ten copyists, at $900 each; one messenger, one assistant messenger, and two laborers; in all, $101,200.

Mr. DUELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the words "chief clerk, $2,000," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Twelve clerks of class four; twenty clerks of class three; twenty-eight clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; twelve copyists, at $900 each; one messenger and three laborers; in all, $123,200.

Mr. DUELL. I hold in my hand the laws passed at the last session of Congress, and I find that ninety-four clerks were given to the office of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury. The committee in this bill reduced the number to sixty-five. The amendment which I have offered makes the number eighty-one, being a reduction of thirteen from the number authorized by the appropriation bill of last year.

I need not say, Mr. Chairman, that the Second Comptroller of the Treasury is charged with high and responsible duties. I hold in my hand a letter written by the Second Comptroller, in which he states to the House that with the force which is allowed by the present bill it will be impossible for him to dispose of the business which is brought before his office. I send the letter to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Second Comptroller's Office, February 28, 1874.

This office is charged by law with the final revision of, and decision upon, all accounts pertaining to the War and Navy Departments, Indians, and Pensions.

The above-named accounts are audited in the offices of the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditors.

The pending legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. No. 2064) makes provision for 173 clerks in the office of the Second, 185 in the office of the Third, and 46 in the office of the Fourth Auditor; total in the three offices, 404.

This office asks for 81 clerks, including copyists or one in the revising office to five in the auditing offices. Experience has demonstrated the fact that the labor of revision cannot be properly performed with a less proportionate force.

It may, however, be said that the force of this office is now less than the ratio of one to five. While this appears to be the case, judging from the whole number of clerks at present employed in the several offices, it is not true in fact, as a large number of clerks in the auditing offices have been diverted from current work, and are engaged in fixing up the accounts and records of said offices.

It is my desire, and has been my endeavor, to bring the business of the office up to current work, particularly the accounts of disbursing officers. Experience has shown that delay in the settlement of these accounts is very expensive to the Government. If these accounts could have been kept up during the late war, and disbursing officers promptly notified of wrong, or overpayments, so that they could have made the proper corrections in their subsequent payments, while the men were yet in service and within reach, millions of dollars would have been saved to the Treasury. These accounts should by all means, and may now, be kept up, but it will be impossible to do so with the force proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. Every head of a Bureau is naturally desirous to obtain for his office a reputation for efficiency and economy by doing the largest amount of work with the least number of clerks that he can. I am by no means insensible to that motive, and have decreased my force as fast as business would permit, and have personally worked much longer than the required hours. But the public interest should be the first object, and that will certainly be jeopardied by the proposed reduction.

J. M. BRODHEAD,
Second Comptroller.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman to modify his amendment by inserting the word "female," so that it will read "female copyists."

Mr. DUELL. I agree to that, and modify my amendment in accordance with the gentleman's suggestion.

I trust this amendment will commend itself to the judgment and good sense of the House. I do not propose by it to raise existing salaries, but simply to place under the Second Comptroller of the Treasury the force which is absolutely necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of that Bureau. I also hold in my hand a statement from the chief clerk of the Second Comptroller's office, showing the amount of business, the accounts audited and adjusted by the Second Comptroller's office during the past year. The total amount is $182,592,213.15.

The committee cannot fail to see the importance of this Bureau, and consequently the importance of giving it a sufficient force to discharge the duties that are devolved upon it. I trust that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will admit the amendment and allow it to be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that the questions in regard to the staff of clerks in the offices of the various Auditors and Comptrollers were passed under close review by the Committee on Appropriations. Some of them we found were employed on a class of work which we thought did not admit of much reduction in their number. As regarded those that were doing the current business of the country that was not specially affected by the war we found that the number ought not to be decreased, but in some instances rather increased; while the number of those that were doing work, the bulk of which arose from the events of the war, and who would necessarily and naturally be getting through with the great work put upon them, ought to be decreased.

Take, for example, the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in whose Bureau were placed, I think in the year 1866, twenty-two cubic cords of papers about the back pay of soldiers. The amount of work was so immense that we had to increase by four hundred the number of clerks to look through these claims with a view to their settlement. But we found that the number of these claims passed upon in the year just closed was only about 50 per cent. of the number in the previous year, and that the number of new claims received was far less than the number of new claims received in the previous year. We said that in a case like that there ought to be a reduction of the clerical force to correspond in some degree with the reduction of business.

Applying that rule to the offices of the various Comptrollers and Auditors, the committee have proposed such reductions as they thought could fairly be made. In some cases we may have cut too deep. Perhaps we had as little reason to cut down in the First Comptroller's office as anywhere, for he must necessarily pass upon all the leading warrants that go through the Treasury Department. We made but a small reduction in his office, and although he thinks it too much, the Committee of the Whole have passed it without change, and we believe they have done right.

Mr. MAYNARD. How many did you reduce it?

Mr. GARFIELD. I can tell the committee the number of clerks and also the amount of money. Last year, $77,320 worth of clerical force was given him, and this year we gave him $67,600 worth; in other words, we have cut down the force $10,000 worth a year. In regard to the Second Comptroller's office, he had last year $138,800 worth of force. We cut it down so as to give him $102,000 worth; in other words, we reduced it $36,800. We reduced his force more than we did that of the First Comptroller, because he had a larger force from which to reduce and because the Second Comptroller is the officer under whom the Army and Navy accounts are settled rather than the First Comptroller. Not only the current accounts of the Army that we now have, but the old outstanding unsettled claims of the war pass there, and we were satisfied that he could stand a greater per centage of reduction than the First Comptroller could.

Now I know of no better way for us to do than to try how we can get along with that reduction, and if we find that we have done too much in that direction it is a thing that can be remedied before any great injury is done by action next winter. I do not believe we have gone further in that direction than we ought to have gone. We could not get any help in the matter of reduction from these Bureaus themselves. I say it without any disposition to be unkind to them, but we had every Auditor and Comptroller before us, and only in two or three instances did any of the persons whom we had before us admit that there could be any reduction at all. There is a kind of grip like that of grim death in the hand of a man who has a company of clerks under his control. They are all good fellows, all intelligent, all valuable, and he does not like to spare any of them, and unless we ourselves somewhat arbitrarily struck down the number we could not do it at all. But this is a large subject; and now, thanking the Committee of the Whole for their kindness, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say a few words before he presses that motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word. I had occasion during the last Congress as a member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service—I am not there now, unfortunately for the country—to examine very carefully and at great length the question of the relative amount of work and of clerical service in every Bureau of the Treasury and to prepare a bill to reorganize that service. I spent upon it, in connection with some other members of the committee, a great deal of time, and I examined the question thoroughly. I examined the Secretary of the Treasury, the Auditors, the Comptrollers, the chief clerks and heads of Bureaus, and individual clerks, from time to time, so as to arrive as nearly as I could at the necessities of each Bureau. I found on that examination that the business of the Second Comptroller's office was much larger than that of the First Comptroller in proportion to the expenditure and to the number of employés in it. I found that the amount of work and the number of accounts and of cases investigated in the Second Comptroller's office was much larger in proportion to the expenditure for that office and in proportion to the number of clerks than in the First Comptroller's, and I then recommended, and have for each year for the last three years moved, whenever this subject has been up in the House, for a corresponding increase in the clerical force in the Second Comptroller's office, because I knew from an actual examination, as careful as I could make it each year for the last three years, that there was an insufficient force in that Bureau. I know that it is so now, and I know that there should not be this arbitrary reduction in the Second Comptroller's office. The public service suffers by it.

Gentlemen perhaps do not realize that these two Bureaus, the First and Second Comptrollers' offices, are the last safeguards for the Treasury. Upon their warrant all moneys pass out of the Treasury. In the Auditors' offices the accounts are stated; in the Comptrollers' offices they are revised, the law applicable to the cases is examined, and the final fiat of those offices passes money from the Treasury. It is important, therefore, for the public service, in the interest of economy and safety, that there should be always a sufficient clerical force to give due and careful examination to every account that passes those offices. I may say here, and it is within the personal knowledge of gentlemen who have examined this matter, that for the last four years, year by year, the very best clerks in the Second Comptroller's office and in the First Comptroller's office have been compelled to leave those offices and to go into other business because the salary was insufficient for their services; I think to the detriment of the public service and to the injury of all the interests of the people and of the Government, we failed to keep those experienced business officers in the Bureaus which guard best the Treasury of the United States, and it is for that reason that I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUELL] in wishing that this force should be restored at least to the extent which his amendment proposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. In opposing the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan I will take occasion to finish what I intended to say in reply to my friend from New York, [Mr. DUELL.] We have reduced the force in this office to the number of nineteen clerks, and there has been given to the Committee on Appropriations no sufficient reason to satisfy them that they have made a mistake in this.

Mr. DUELL. The reduction is twenty-nine from last year.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have increased in some offices.

Mr. DUELL. You have reduced the entire force twenty-nine.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman if there was not a greater proportional decrease in this Bureau last year than in any other Bureau, and also this year?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not. The decrease made in the Second Auditor's office is proportionately more than twice that made in this office.

Mr. CONGER. Well, that is a Bureau where the business is falling away.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the statements made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DUELL,] which have evidently been prepared with care, will be in print before we go into committee again upon this bill.

I ask gentlemen of the committee to read what shall be in the RECORD on that subject on both sides of this question, and be prepared to act according to their judgment in view of all the facts in the case. If we are to go through this bill with anything like individual preferences; if we have any pet officers whom we want to save, we shall never get through with anything like equity and justice in regard to them all.

If we have cut any too deep in the office of the First Comptroller, I do not think we have cut deep in the Second Comptroller's office. I have more doubt whether we have not cut too deep in the first than that we have cut too deep here; about this I have no serious doubt. We have given the Second Comptroller an increase of copyists. There are two classes of persons in his office. One class consists of accountants, of persons who are almost lawyers, who can state claims and report upon them. The other class comprises mere copyists, and we thought it wise to increase the number of that class. If gentlemen think it necessary we can increase still further the number of copyists, so that the work done by the accountants when completed can be copied in a fair hand by the nine-hundred dollar copyists. That will be economical. But to have a twelve, fourteen, or sixteen hundred dollar clerk to do the business of copying is neither wise nor economical.

Now I think if you want to increase the force of the Second Comptroller, give him in the upper ranks of his force good and thorough accountants and a large number of copyists. We believe that we can save $36,000 in this office. If you think we ought not to try to save so much say so. Now, in view of the importance of this subject, if gentlemen have anything which they wish to have printed let them have it done now.

Mr. DUELL. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a further statement of the chief clerk of this office.

No objection was made.

The statement is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Second Comptroller's Office, February 28, 1874.

SIR: the following is a list of the divisions of this office as at present constituted, with the amount of actual disbursements embraced in the accounts, revised by each, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, namely:

Divisions.	Number of clerks.	Amount.
Paymaster's division	14	$43,568,853 25
Quartermaster's division	15	47,343,125 62
Navy and Marine Corps division	10	24,054,935 35
Army Pension division	19	27,476,730 61
State and Miscellaneous Claims division	2	2,035,246 62
Engineer's division	2	10,243,321 63
Subsistence division	4	5,936,243 78
Indian division	2	15,587,459 32
Ordnance and Medical division	1	2,500,881 95
Book-keeper's (recruiting, contingent, signal service, freedmen and refugees, and miscellaneous) division	5	3,845,415 02
Copying and miscellaneous work	7
Total	81	182,592,213 15

Of which amount $6,495,551.51 were for claims which arose during the late war.
This is an average of more than $10,000 per day for each clerk actually engaged in the work of revision for each working day of the year.

Very respectfully,

E. B. CURTIS,
Chief Clerk.

Hon. J. M. BRODHEAD,
Second Comptroller.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BANNING: Resolutions of a citizens' meeting of Cleveland, Ohio, in opposition to an increase of the currency, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: The petition of citizens of Cattlettsburgh, Kentucky, asking for the establishment of a district court near that point, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COBURN: The petition of the board of education of Indiana, to have the arsenal of the United States at Indianapolis granted to the State for a polytechnic school, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CROUNSE: The remonstrance of certain citizens of Nebraska, against extension of letters-patent for the Haines harvester, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. DUELL: The petition of Colonel Frank Place and 57 others, for passage of House bill No. 1179, granting increased pensions to disabled soldiers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FIELD: Papers relating to the claim of Isaac W. Ingersoll and Joseph Granger, of Detroit, Michigan, for damages under a contract for building a marine hospital, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of citizens living on the Seventh street road, in the District of Columbia, asking for a more equitable mode of taxing property for city improvements, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. GLOVER: The petition of many citizens of Lewis County, Missouri, asking relief for James Hill, of Lewis County, Missouri, late a private of Company F, Twenty-first Infantry Missouri Volunteers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The memorial of the board of education of the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the sale of the arsenal grounds in the city of Indianapolis, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: The petition of 18 citizens of Marshall County, West Virginia, for an act authorizing the manufacture of patent-right articles by other than the owners of patent-rights on the payment of a reasonable royalty thereon, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of James C. Weaver, superintendent of public schools, and others, of Accomack County, Virginia, for compensation for a public school building used by the Army of the United States during the years 1861 and 1862, and destroyed while in such use, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of G. A. Hulfish, postmaster, and other citizens of Haymarket, Virginia, for the establishment of a post-route from Haymarket, via Buckland, to New Baltimore, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WALDRON: Certain papers to accompany House bill No. 1383, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WOODFORD: The petition of Joseph Howland and 91 others, for the passage of House bill No. 1179, granting increased pensions to disabled soldiers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 20, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3025) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No 3027) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Van Ranselear Morgan, Thomas M. Jones, and Charles H. Fauntleroy, of Virginia, and A. S. Taylor, of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River, across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. No. 2907) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Concord, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3029) to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. WEST. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a bill that has just been received from the House of Representatives for the purpose of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate sundry bills from the House of Representatives.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 3029) to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 3025) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. No. 3027) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Van Ranselear Morgan, Thomas M. Jones, and Charles H. Fauntleroy, of Virginia, and A. S. Taylor, of Maryland—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to Senate resolution of the 19th ultimo, information relative to the Indian agencies in Nevada; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation to complete the canal around the Lower Rapids of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the erection of a custom-house and post-office at Green Bay, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation sufficient for dredging and rendering navigable a channel between the harbor piers at Ahnepee, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Oregon, in favor of the passage of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad bill; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, requesting the return of the rebel battle-flags captured by Wisconsin soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of B. W. Baird and others, citizens of the United States, protesting against extending letters-patent for the Haines Harvester; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have a petition, numerously signed by merchants, ship-owners, and ship-masters of Portland, Maine; another of a like character, signed by merchants, ship-owners, and ship-masters of Bucksport, Maine, asking for the abolition of compulsory pilotage. I move their reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented a resolution of the board of county commissioners of Morris County, Kansas, praying for an amendment to a bill pending before the Senate for the sale and disposal of the Kansas Indian lands in that county, and providing for the distribution of the proceeds of that sale; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented a memorial of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, held at Lombard street, in the city of Baltimore, asking that the death penalty for crime may be changed to imprisonment at labor for a term of years, or for life; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of the Forest Farmers' Club, of Harford County, Maryland, asking the abatement of the evil of intoxicating drinks in the rural districts of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TIPTON presented the petition of P. W. Woodlief and accompanying papers, asking remuneration for property taken in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Andrew J. Lasley, late a private in Company K, Second United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT. I also present the memorial of the board of education of the State of Indiana and others, praying that the arsenal grounds situated in the city of Indianapolis and belonging to the United States may be granted to the State of Indiana for a polytechnic school, and remonstrating against the sale of the same to private parties. I find that this memorial is signed by the superintendent of public instruction and president of the State board of education of Indiana, by the governor of the State, Thomas A. Hendricks, who is ex officio a member of that board; by the president of the State normal school at Terre Haute; by the superintendent of the Evansville public schools; by the president of the State University at Bloomington; by the superintendent of the Fort Wayne public schools; and by the superintendent of the Indianapolis public schools.

If I may be pardoned a moment I will refer to some of the recitals and the prayer of this memorial. The memorial recites that information has been received that Congress will discontinue the use of the arsenal located in the city of Indianapolis, and dispose of the property by public sale; and further, that this property has been appropriated and used for public purposes, and the people of the State would be much disappointed at its sale for private uses. It further recites that there is no polytechnic institution in that State, and as the grounds are admirably adapted to the uses of such an institution, therefore the board and the other parties that I have named earnestly remonstrate against the sale of the property, and pray Congress to grant the same to the State of Indiana for public uses for the purpose suggested. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Oswego, New York, touching the importance of the improvement of the port of Oswego, owing to the severe injury which has been done to the old pier on the west side of the mouth of the harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Henry J. Wood, praying compensation for the use of his property taken possession of, as alleged, by the Government for public purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEVENSON presented a memorial of merchants, manufacturers, and importers of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, praying for the rejection of the House bill which passed on the 14th of April abolishing the office of appraiser of imported merchandise at that port as injurious to the general interests of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 343) for the relief of purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States, to report the same, with the opinion that it ought not to pass. The honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] is interested in the bill. There is a written report. If the Senator desires it, the bill may be placed on the Calendar for consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON. I prefer that it should go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the report will be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 153) for the relief of Silas I. Field and the heirs of the late Samuel F. Dalley, of the city of Little Rock, and State of Arkansas, to report the same with the opinion that it ought not to pass, with a written report. If the Senator from Arkansas desires this to go upon the Calendar, of course there is no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Upon reflection, I will ask that the bill go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. I am directed by the Committee on Mines and Mining to request of the Senate that a letter addressed to the chairman of the committee by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I now present, be printed and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 666) granting to the Nevada County Narrow-gauge Railroad Company a right of way through the public lands for a railroad, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1171) for the relief of George P. Fisher, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials of citizens of the United States who served as soldiers in the late war of the rebellion, praying for the equalization of soldiers' bounties, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 717) to equalize bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking for removal of the charge of desertion from George Schwartz, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 718) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Schwartz, deceased, late private Company F Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James P. Gillespie, of Ohio, praying that he be paid the sum of $26,545.33, claimed by him as informer in revenue cases, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) I am directed by the Committee on Privilges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Francis W. Sykes, claiming a seat as Senator from Alabama, to report the same back adversely to the memorialist and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. There is a written report, which, together with the views of the minority, I ask may be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present the views of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on this subject, and ask that they may be printed.

The report was ordered to be printed, with the views of the minority.

ELIZABETH J. KING.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2675) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth J. King, have had the same under consideration and have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. The case being one of peculiar hardship and which will commend itself readily to the justice and to the sympathies of the Senate, I ask for the present consideration of the bill. We adopt the House report, which is very brief, and as the facts are striking I ask that the report be read and the case presently considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth J. King, widow of Herbert King, late captain of Company F, Third Regiment Kentucky Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. PRATT. Now let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. JOHN D. YOUNG in the House of Representatives on the 27th of March:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth J. King, submit the following report:

Captain Herbert King, the husband of the applicant, was captain of Company F, Third Kentucky Infantry; entered the Union Army in the fall of 1862; was at the battle of Shiloh, and from exposure took sick and was for some time unable to do duty, and was permitted to go home. Not getting any better, in the fall of 1862 he tendered his resignation, but before its acceptance, and while on his way back to the Union Army with fifteen men whom he had enlisted, including two of his sons, he was set upon by the rebels under Morgan, his house burned, his property destroyed, and himself and men taken prisoners. They were taken to Danville, and from there to Camp Dick Robinson, and kept there until after the battle of Perryville. The rebels, on being forced to retreat, chained him to a wagon, and, with the others, including his two sons, took him to Cumberland Gap, where they were all hung, and because they knew him to be a Union soldier. The acceptance of his resignation did not arrive until May, a week after his murder. The Department could not grant a pension, on account of his resignation. The case is an extremely hard one, leaving the widow destitute and in want.

The committee think it a meritorious case, if ever there was one requiring a special act. The committee report favorably, and ask the passage of the bill, giving her a pension according to his rank.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 719) in regard to the condemnation of lands for public use in the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 720) conferring the right to construct a tunnel through the White Pine Mountain, State of Nevada, and to purchase public lands contiguous thereto; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that that bill may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 721) for the restoration of the lands in Fort Sedgwick reservation, in Colorado and Nebraska, to settlement and entry; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 722) to alter and establish the limits of the district courts in the eastern district of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 723) to repeal a part of an act making appropriations for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same, approved April 18, 1874; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that that bill may be printed. It is a very important bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 724) amendatory of and supplemental to the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 725) for the relief of William Hodson; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask for the present consideration of a House bill which is on the table granting ordnance to the town of Concord.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2907) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Concord, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes, was read three times and passed. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver to the municipal authorities of Concord, Massachusetts, ten pieces of condemned brass cannon, to be used in the erection of a monument at the Old North bridge, to commemorate the first repulse of the troops of Great Britain in the war of the Revolution, on the 19th day of April, 1775.

SUMNER MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I desire to take this opportunity to give notice to the Senate that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal, I shall present for the consideration of the Senate resolutions upon the life and character and public services of our late associate, Senator Sumner.

ALASKA FUR TRADE.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2667) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather authentic information as to the condition and importance of the fur trade in the Territory of Alaska. I wish to say that there is a necessity for the early passage of this bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

By the bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint some person qualified by experience and education a special agent for the purpose of visiting the various trading stations and Indian villages in the Territory of Alaska, the Seal islands, and the large islands to the north of them in Behring Sea, for the purpose of collecting and reporting to him all possible authentic information upon the present condition of the seal fisheries of Alaska, the haunts and habits of the seal, and the preservation and extension of the fisheries as a source of revenue to the United States, together with like information respecting the fur-bearing animals of Alaska generally, the statistics of the fur trade, and the condition of the people or natives, especially those upon whom the successful prosecution of the fisheries and fur trade is dependent; such agent to receive as compensation eight dollars per day while actually thus employed, with all actual and necessary traveling expenses incurred therein. The appointment thus made is not to continue longer than two years. The Secretary of the Navy is also authorized to detail an officer of the Navy to go in connection with the person above-mentioned, who shall be charged with the same duties, and shall make a like report upon all subjects therein named; and shall also inquire and report whether the contracts as to the seal-fisheries have been complied with by the persons or company now in possession, and whether those contracts can be safely extended.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to have some explanation of that bill. Is it reported from a committee?

Mr. SPENCER. It passed the House of Representatives and has been reported from the Committee on Commerce, and is recommended by the Treasury Department. It provides for the appointment of a special agent for the Treasury Department, and for a person to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, to examine into the condition of the fur trade in Alaska. If the bill is to become a law, it is necessary that it should be passed immediately.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it wholly unnecessary that this new office should be created. I think all the information that any agent who may be appointed could obtain is accessible to the Treasury without employing a man at eight dollars a day for the space of two years, besides the expenses which he will incur to gather that information. There ought to be some limit to the multiplication of offices, especially when there is no apparent necessity for them.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not know whether it is worth while to appoint another officer for the purpose or not, and yet my impression is that it is important. Here is a fishery from which the Government receives $262,000 direct. In addition to that, the skins which are taken on the islands are sent to London, there cured, and imported here, the duties on which amount to over $200,000 more. It appears to me that it is well worth while for the Government to have a proper watch and care over that fishery; and therefore I see no reason why we should not appoint an officer for that purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. What the Senator from Connecticut says as to the importance of this matter is undoubtedly correct, and it may be that some watch is necessary; but we have a military post on those islands; we have military officers there. Why cannot this duty be devolved upon them? If the committee are satisfied that this is the most economical and efficient way to have this investigation made, of course I shall not interpose; but I supposed we had military officers up there who have quite little enough to do, and who might well enough make the investigation and report contemplated by this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. There are several advantages in sending some intelligent person to report upon these fisheries. The contract with the parties who hold them is that one hundred thousand shall be taken each year, one-half on the island of Saint Paul and one-half on the island of Saint George. It is believed by the Treasury Department, with such information as they can get, that too large a number is taken from Saint George and not enough from Saint Paul; that it is possible to perhaps indefinitely increase the amount taken from Saint Paul. If this can be done judiciously year by year, by authorizing the taking of ten thousand additional next year, ten thousand additional to that the following year, the income of the Government will be very largely increased. While that attempt is being made, it must also be determined that by this increased taking of seals the sealing-grounds are not caused to be deserted by the seals, not driven away elsewhere.

Another element, also important to be ascertained, is whether there are other islands in the Alaskan group on the Russian coast which the seals can resort to and desert our islands and thus destroy the revenue of the Government and this business entirely. This duty can be performed by the officer named in this bill. Certainly the pay fixed is a very moderate compensation. It is quite possible, I believe myself it is certain, that if there is an intelligent report on this matter showing all the facts the Government will be enabled in the course of a few years by gradual accretion to double the amount of revenue which it receives without injury to the trade.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not been satisfied yet that we have not officers of the Army and Navy, skilled officers, who could do this duty as well as any civilians who might be picked out for the purpose. I should much prefer that an officer of the Army and an officer of the Navy should be selected for this duty. An officer of the Navy would be prepared by his education, by his observation in that region of country, as a skilled person.

Mr. SPENCER. I will state to the Senator that by the bill one naval officer is to be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see no reason why an Army officer should not be substituted for the civilian. The Senator from California says this is very small compensation. It will amount to something like fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. That is not a very large sum perhaps, but two years' compensation at eight dollars per day, together with the expenses of travel, the employment of boats, &c., will doubtless make a large sum.

Mr. SARGENT. If we can increase the killing of seals by ten thousand in one year, which is confidently believed and which we may do if we have a report showing that it is safe, the very first year will pay all the expense.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we have special agents of the Treasury Department; we have officers of the Army and Navy, many of them without employment; we have persons engaged in all branches of the service. We have officers of the Army stationed in Alaska. There is a company of troops there. Supernumerary officers are now to be found in San Francisco and various places on the Pacific coast who could be detailed to make this report without any special authority of law for that purpose. Both the War and Navy Departments have at their command skilled, educated officers, who could be sent without the formality of law to perform this duty. Their salary will have to be paid them anyhow, and a great saving would be made in that way. It seems to me that my friend from California, who is generally very careful and prudent in regard to expenditures, and a member of the Committee on Appropriations, might see a way here of saving a small sum of money by detailing accomplished officers of the Army and Navy to perform this duty.

Mr. MORTON. I have learned something about the object of this bill, and am of opinion that it ought to pass, and that it is somewhat important it should pass soon. A question has been raised as to the number of seals that may be taken annually on these two islands without diminishing the supply, and it has been thought important to send out a scientific man, a professor of natural history; and I understand the gentleman has been selected by the Smithsonian Institution as a man of learning in that kind of science for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon the habits and number of the seals and the number that can be killed annually without diminishing the supply, and that that is the primary object of this commission. If that is so, an officer of the Army or Navy, although he might be a scientific and well-informed man in his profession, cannot properly perform the duties that are to be assigned to this officer. The expense will be trifling compared with the importance of the commission. I think the bill ought to pass, and ought to pass at once.

The bill was passed.

ARMS TO NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bills on the Calendar in their order.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 499) to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the State of Nebraska, the consideration of which was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] after the word "raids," in line 8, to insert—

And for distribution among Indians who are exposed to intrusion and encroachment by white settlers.

Mr. INGALLS. I presume the Senator from Connecticut does not seriously intend to insist on his amendment.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not like the bill; I do not think it ought to pass in its present shape; and yet I do not see any reason why if one class of men on the borders should have arms to defend themselves another class should not. The proposition is to put arms in the hands of settlers on the border that they may defend themselves from Indian raids. There is certainly abundant evidence that the rights of the Indians have been encroached upon by the whites; and it appears to me that if they have arms put in their hands they may defend those rights, and it would be just as proper as it would be for the whites to defend their rights.

Mr. TIPTON. I will state the object to be accomplished by the bill, as I understand it. We have advanced settlements near the western line of Nebraska. Indians when hunting the buffalo, if even outside of the lines of the State, sometimes leave the body of their force, straggle into the settlements, steal the property of the settler, and if he resists them take his life. If it is known that the settlers have arms they are not likely to be troubled. Many of the settlers are poor, very poor, and have come there without even teams, for the purpose of trying to make themselves homes by slow personal labor. It is not for the purpose of arming them that they may go out and depredate upon Indians at all. There is no such thought; but the State is not able to furnish them arms in case they are attacked in their homes. If you talk about a State militia, a State militia could not be on the ground when a little community is suddenly surprised by an Indian raid, whether it is two, three, or a dozen Indians; but you give confidence to the frontier settler when you allow arms to be distributed by the authority of the Government, arms that he is not able to procure for his own defense; and he is not so likely to be called upon to use any arms if it is known that he is in possession of them, but it is not to enable him to go out and make war upon anybody; nothing of the kind.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not see why the argument which the Senator from Nebraska uses is not also applicable to the Indians. It is not proposed to furnish arms to the whites that they may go out and assault the Indians in their wigwams, in their camps; nor does the amendment propose that if you shall place arms in the hands of the Indians they shall with them go and intrude upon the settlements of the whites, if those whites are not on the reservations of the Indians.

But, as I said before, I am opposed to the bill, not for this reason only, but because I do not think we have any right to put arms in the hands of private citizens. That argument was presented very clearly a few days ago by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] and I think it is a perfectly sound argument, and a reason why the bill should be defeated whether this amendment is adopted or not. I will withdraw, by the permission of the Senate, the amendment which I proposed, and offer the following, to come in at the close of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Connecticut asks leave to withdraw his amendment. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is withdrawn. The amendment he now proposes will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add the following:

And shall furnish the General Government with good and sufficient bonds to prevent the use of such arms and ammunition for any other purpose than that named herein.

Mr. INGALLS. I confess that I am at a loss to perceive exactly the purpose of the Senator from Connecticut in the amendments that he proposes to the pending bill. Whether his customary and characteristic gravity has deserted him and he intends to be facetious, or whether he seriously desires to invite a war of extermination between the races, or whether he merely wishes to emphasize his belief that in all the wrongs upon the border the white man is uniformly the aggressor, he leaves entirely to conjecture. But if he had been familiar, as I have been for the past fifteen years, with the bloody annals of the frontier he would withdraw his amendment and withhold his opposition to the bill.

It is not necessary at this time to enter into a discussion of what is popularly known as the Indian policy of the Government. I shall take some future opportunity to express to the Senate the views that I entertain on that subject, and to endeavor to enforce the apparently forgotten dogma that upon the frontier the white man has some rights that even an Indian is bound to respect. But irrespective of that question, irrespective of the question of the value of the Indian policy or of the respective rights or wrongs of the Indian and the white man, whether of aggression or retaliation, no one can deny that the first duty, the least obligation, that the Government owes to the settler who goes to the outposts and the skirmish-line of civilization is protection. He is not, as the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Maine would seem to intimate, an outlaw; neither is he a trespasser nor a tenant at sufferance on the public domain. The Government surveys the land; it establishes land districts; it appoints officers and invites purchase and settlement; and the remotest homesteader or pre-emptor is as much entitled to security for his life and property as though he stood upon the floor of this Capitol. He endures enough of hardship, enough of danger in his unequal contest with the stubborn forces of nature, without being exposed to the added horrors of pillage and massacre.

I know, sir, that it is fashionable with a certain class of sentimentalists on this floor and elsewhere to deplore what are commonly called the wrongs of the Indian, and to affect to believe that in all the border outrages the white man is always the aggressor. Acting upon this theory the Government has assumed the guardianship of the Indian; it has made him its ward; it has placed him upon reservations upon which no white man has the right to enter even to recover his property that has been stolen or to recapture his wife and children who may have been seized and carried within those sacred precincts. Here the Indians are fed, nurtured, and propagated at an annual expense of millions of dollars to the public Treasury.

With regard to the wisdom of this policy I have serious doubts, for I believe it would be as wise to treat with and place upon a reservation the rattlesnake and cayote as the Apache and the Cheyenne; but the treaties have been made and they must be respected. A great nation cannot afford to break its faith even with irresponsible criminals. But, sir, if the Indian made war upon the rules and tactics of Turenne, McClellan, and the other great captains, there might be some ground for the objection urged by the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Maine. Unfortunately Indian warfare is not scientific. While the settler is at work in his field Red Cloud or Spotted Tail, with their band of bronze devils, crawl through the grass and in an hour the cabin is a heap of ruins, the mother and children are captured, and the Indians have fled to their reservations beyond the reach of pursuit.

The Federal Government has assumed the exclusive control of the Indians; the State has no right to punish an Indian or to pursue an offender; the civil law is powerless, because the settlers themselves are often in exposed localities in unorganized districts, unable to associate for protection.

The Senator from Maine the other day, when this bill was before the Senate, expressed a regret that these arms were not to be placed in the hands of the militia or some regularly organized military force for the protection of the exposed localities. I fully sympathize with this sentiment. I should be glad to have these arms placed in the hands of the militia or of some organized force; but that is not the policy of the Government. I go further than the Senator and say that I anticipate with pleasure and satisfaction the day when the military authorities shall have the entire control of the Indian Department, with full power to make all contracts, expend and disburse all appropriations, and punish all infractions of law by whosoever committed. The profession of arms is the profession of honor, and when the administration of this branch of the service is confided to the hands of the Army, the American people will have the satisfaction of knowing that it is in the hands of men who do not know how to lie and who have never learned to steal. But until this consummation is reached, the only method of protecting the settlers within reach of hostile Indians is in the manner proposed by this bill.

The idea of relying upon the militia, the law, the State, or the civil authorities for protection is wholly untenable and shows an entire want of appreciation of the nature of the danger to be apprehended. It would be as sensible to talk of relying upon these agencies to guard against the pestilence that walketh in darkness, the destruction that wasteth at noon-day, or any other destructive and unreasoning force governed by the operation of natural laws.

There is but one humane and just course to pursue. Since the Government refuses protection and the authorities are without the power to defend, give to these brave men who are laying the foundations of social order and permanent institutions in the wilderness the means of defending themselves and their families from death, or from captivity and outrage that are worse than the most cruel death.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is very evident from the speech we have just heard that the friendless need friends. I sympathize in some respects with the Senator from Kansas. I feel that the settler ought to be defended. I think also the Indian, who is but a step beyond him, should have equal means of defense, he having equal rights to defend himself.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the Government assume to protect the Indians?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Government assumes to protect the Indians; and this is one way in which I want the Indians to be protected by the Government. If the Government assumes their protection and authorizes men on their borders to use arms and places arms in their hands that they may defend themselves against the wrongs which the Indians are likely to commit, I ask that the Government will place arms in the hands of the Indians that they may defend themselves from wrongs which the whites may commit against them.

Now, the Senator from Kansas says, and very truly, in substance that the wrongs are not all with the white men. I admit they are not; and I say also that trespassing is not all with the Indians. The Senator knows that lands set apart in the State which he represents have been crowded upon by white men in defiance of right and in defiance of law, and when they have occupied these lands, lands set apart for the Indians, which belonged to the Indians by treaty, they have gone on there with such strength and such power as to deprive the Indian of their rights and drive them to another Territory.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator would favor me with an instance of the wrong which he speaks of. I am unaware of any such case.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I believe it is well understood that the white settlers trespassed on the Kaw lands to such an extent that it was admitted in this Chamber by a Senator from that State that there were twenty thousand of them on the lands of the Kaw Indians and they could not be driven away. I do not state the precise words, but I do the substance. I will not, however, remark further upon that point.

The Senator spoke of the policy of the Government in regard to militia. If I understand the policy of the Government, it is that every State shall have an organized militia and that the Government shall distribute to the governors of the several States arms in certain quantities according to the representation of the different States in Congress, that those arms under the direction of the governor shall be placed in the hands of the militia. Now, if the governor of Kansas or the governor of Nebraska has arms, as I think he is entitled to them, he has the means to organize the militia, to place arms in their hands for their defense. Such I understand to be the practice and the policy of this Government. But the bill asks that the parties to whom these arms may be distributed may give "good and sufficient security for the return of said arms to the United States after the necessity for their use has ceased." What will be the condition of the arms when they shall have been distributed and been in the hands of the settlers one, two, or three, or four years? For what purpose will they have been used? What will become of the ammunition placed in their hands under this bill, provided there shall be no Indian raids? What I ask by the amendment is that the governor of the State shall take bond not only for the return of the arms, but that they shall not be used improperly. Let them be used for the very purposes designed by this bill; and if they shall be so used and that shall be the pleasure of Congress, very well; but hold them from an improper use by which the value of the arms may be destroyed.

Mr. LOGAN. I was a little surprised the other day when it was said there was no precedent for this bill. Why, sir, this bill is a copy of a law found in the seventeenth volume of the United States Statutes at Large, page 138:

An act to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the Territory of Montana.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed, without delay, to cause one thousand effective breech-loading rifled muskets and two hundred thousand cartridges to be forwarded to and placed at the disposal of the governor of the Territory of Montana, delivered at Virginia City, in said Territory, for distribution among the settlers of the Gallatin Valley and other exposed localities in said Territory, for home defense against Indian raids; and the governor of said Territory, in making said distribution, shall take from the parties to whom they may be distributed good and sufficient security for the return of said arms to the United States after the necessity for their use has ceased.

Approved May 21, 1872.

Under this statute arms were distributed to the Territory of Montana. On the application of the governor of Nebraska in person, verbally made to me as chairman of the Military Committee, this bill was before the committee after being introduced by the Senator from that State, and agreed to and an amendment accepted incorporating the State of Kansas in connection with the State of Nebraska. I have given you the precedent for it, and the necessity that exists for this legislation has been stated. If the requirement of law that there shall be a military organization in the different States had been complied with and the law of distribution of arms to the militia of the different States was carried out so that it was applicable to these States, there would be no necessity for an enactment of this kind; but inasmuch as there is no militia in either of these border States there can be no compliance there with the law of distribution of arms to the militia of the different States. Therefore the necessity for a law of this kind.

I do not think from the examination I have made that the number of arms asked for by either of these States is too many for the necessities of the people on the border; and so far as ammunition is concerned, if the Senator from Connecticut will make a calculation, he will see that four hundred thousand cartridges are none too many, if there should be a necessity at all for using the arms. It is just the complement that ought to be issued with the arms. So far as his argument about a return of cartridges is concerned, I do not want to say that that is absurd; I will not use such language; but there is no expectation when cartridges are distributed to soldiers or to anybody else for use that the cartridges themselves are to be returned with the guns. That is all I desire to say about that.

But I wish to make a remark in reply to the Senator from Connecticut in reference to the arming of the savages on the border. Knowing him as well as I do, and believing him and knowing him to be an honest, upright Christian gentleman, I was very much surprised at the savage barbarity that exhibited itself in the amendment that he offered to this bill. For a man in this age of Christian civilization, with all the Christian impulses that surround us, to ask that guns be distributed among savages that they might prey on civilized man, is something that I never expected to come from that Senator.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I believe it is not designed that these arms shall be placed in the hands of men to prey on anybody, but merely to defend themselves. My proposition was that the Indians might have arms to defend themselves, also.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that is the proposition.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Another thing. I have yet to learn something new in regard to the principles of Christianity if they deprive a man of the right of self-defense. On the contrary, it appears to me that lies at the very foundation of Christianity.

Mr. LOGAN. Self-defense, Mr. President!

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask one question in relation to this matter of arms? I should like to ask for information whether under the treaty policy of the Government arms have not from time to time been issued to the Indians?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly they have been.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then it seems to me this bill would be only placing the white men on an equality with them.

Mr. LOGAN. I want merely to say in reply to the Senator from Connecticut about the right of self-defense that that is a God-given right that belongs to all animal creation, and one that it is not necessary to argue at all; but it must be self-defense, it must not be an aggressive act. The distinction between civilized man and the savage man is very marked; the nomadic race roams and travels about seeking out civilization as the wild animal of the bush its prey. They are to be armed for what purpose? We know the characteristic of barbarity in savage life is to prey upon his fellow-man. Just the contrary is the characteristic of civilization. Why, sir, you might as well ask that scalping-knives be placed in the hands of the dre savage of the plains, that he might take the top from the child and scalp it before its mother, as has been done on many an occasion, as to ask to put arms in their hands to prey on civilized man. Let the Senator from Connecticut read the savage barbarity enacted by the Indians in Minnesota where the children were scalped and their brains dashed out in the presence of their mothers against the walls of the houses. And yet he asks that arms be put into the hands of savages that they may prey on civilized man!

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. That amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. LOGAN. It is withdrawn, but your remarks are not withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of Friday last, which is the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana, on which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Missouri does not desire to proceed, I ask that the pending order be informally laid aside and the present bill concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that by unanimous consent the pending order be laid aside informally for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill under discussion at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. INGALLS. I make that suggestion, understanding that the Senator from Missouri does not desire now to proceed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This may lead to a little consideration. I have no objection that it shall be considered now.

Mr. BOGY rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair does not understand the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri prefers to go on.

Mr. LOGAN. This bill, I suppose, will come up as the unfinished business to-morrow morning in the morning hour. Inasmuch as the morning hour expired while I was on the floor, I shall ask the floor again to finish my remarks on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be entitled to the floor on the bill, and it being the first bill on the Calendar will come up of course when the Calendar is reached.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 17th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots; and

An act (S. No. 191) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels."

NAME OF A VESSEL.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2350) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of registry and enrollment to the schooner Almina, and changing the name to Minnie Davis. There is no objection whatever to it, and there are urgent reasons why it should be acted upon. Therefore I ask that it be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of registry, or enrollment and license, to the schooner Almina, owned by Bruce M. Davis, of Alexandria Bay, New York, and to change the name Almina to that of Minnie Davis.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1590) to provide for the better protection of the frontier settlements of Texas against Indian and Mexican depredations; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3086) to remove the political disabilities of George E. Pickett, of Virginia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 193) for the benefit of Uriah Porter; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2907) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Concord, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting in obedience to law a copy of a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claim reported as No. 85 and known as the Doña Aña Bend colony; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1590) to provide for the better protection of the frontier settlements of Texas against Indian and Mexican depredations was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 3086) to remove the political disabilities of George E. Pickett, of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. BAYARD. With the leave of the Senator from Missouri who is entitled to the floor I offer an amendment to the bill now before the Senate. I ask that it be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BAYARD, as follows:

Strike out the preamble and the bill, and in lieu thereof insert:

At an election held in the State of Louisiana on the 4th of November, 1872, in accordance with the constitution and laws of that State, John McEnery was elected governor, Davidson B. Penn lieutenant-governor, and sundry other persons comprising what was known as the "fusion ticket" were also elected, being a majority of the candidates for the General Assembly and the several State offices constituting the "government" of the State of Louisiana, as shown by the actual count and official returns of all the votes cast at said election; and whereas the persons aforesaid, so as aforesaid elected, duly assembled and organized in their respective capacities and departments as the "government" of the State of Louisiana, and severally entered upon and continued in the discharge of their respective official duties, until they were unlawfully compelled, by armed forces acting under the authority of the President of the United States, to desist from the performance of their said duties and to disperse; and whereas William Pitt Kellogg, who was a defeated candidate for governor, and Caius Cæsar Antoine, who was a defeated candidate for lieutenant-governor, and many other persons who were defeated candidates for the several State offices, and for the General Assembly, did, by the unauthorized and illegal action and interference of the Federal authorities, civil and military, obtain and hold armed possession of the State-house, and dispossessed and excluded therefrom the legally elected officers aforesaid, who constituted the only lawful executive and legislative officers of said State; and whereas the said Kellogg and his said associates, by aid of Federal armed power, have usurped and are now exercising, without legal warrant or authority and in defiance of the will of the people of the State of Louisiana, as expressed at the election aforesaid, and in violation of the letter and spirit of the constitution and laws of the said State and of the United States, the powers and functions which belong only to the legal government of the State of Louisiana; and whereas it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to repair, so far as possible, the wrong and injustice done as aforesaid to the people of Louisiana, and to protect the people of said State against usurpation, and to support and maintain them in the enjoyment of the government chosen and elected by them: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall, within ten days after the passage of this act, by proclamation duly made, notify the people of Louisiana that all hinderance, obstacle, or impediment on the part of the Government of the United States, or any officer, soldier, or servant thereof, to the peaceable and legal assumption of the functions, powers, and duties of his said office of governor of the State of Louisiana by the said John McEnery, and of lieutenant-governor by the said Davidson B. Penn, and by the persons who were severally elected as aforesaid to the General Assembly of said State, and of the persons who were severally, as aforesaid, duly elected to the other State offices respectively, be, and the same is hereby, withdrawn, so that they may, without let or hinderance, proceed to fill the offices to which they have been as aforesaid duly elected, and to exercise all powers lawfully connected therewith.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, the bill offered a few days ago by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] providing for an election in the State of Louisiana, to be held under the supervision of an agent appointed by the General Government of the United States, presents to this body, in my opinion, the most important subject that has claimed its attention for a very long time. It involves not only a fundamental, but the fundamental, life-giving, and life-preserving principle of our whole system of government. Nor can I conceive of any question that may arise in the future more vitally connected with the interests of this great nation than the one before us to-day. However much we may differ as to the powers of the Federal Government under the present Constitution—whether those powers are enumerated and specific, or general and derivative in their nature—or as to the powers delegated to the General Government and those retained by the States, we all agree upon this one great fact, that all the powers, functions, and offices of the Federal Government were originally derived from the States. The States were the source and fountain of all political power, and they granted to the confederated Republic in which they united all the power and authority which we possess to-day. In the free consent of the different States this Government had its birth; by their sufferance and support we "live, and move, and have our being;" and when that support is withdrawn, or the central power gains the mastery over those that first conferred authority, then this great political edifice must turn to dust or despotism.

Hence I say that the question presented in the bill of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin involves the life-giving and life-preserving principle, the very foundation on which this Government rests, and the only principle that can save it from revolution and ruin.

But while all agree in the general fact that the whole power and authority contained in the Federal Constitution were derived from the separate States, yet there has always been different opinions among our greatest statesmen as to the amount of power thus delegated. On this subject there have always been two schools of statesmen and publicists in this country, differing somewhat widely upon this point. One school might be denominated the latitudinarians and the other the strict constructionists. Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson, two of the greatest men and ablest statesmen this country has ever produced, may be regarded as true types of these two classes. Mr. Hamilton believed it would be better for the whole nation to have more power concentrated in the central government, and his interpretations of the Constitution, as found in the Federalist and other writings of this distinguished statesman and patriot, plainly indicate his tendencies in this direction. Mr. Jefferson, who was his peer in all statesman-like qualities, and whose mind was ever on the watch to prevent all encroachments upon popular freedom, strongly inclined to the doctrine that all power should be reserved to the States, except such as might be absolutely necessary to discharge the functions of the General Government. Both these great men agreed as to the common origin of all our political power in this Government of the United States, but differed as to the amount that should be delegated and retained by the States conferring the power and composing the Government.

In those days each State was sovereign, containing within itself all the elements, power, and prerequisites for independent self-government. To secure a greater good each State, still preserving its sovereignty, conceded so much of its original power as would give sufficient authority to a union of separate republics to enable that union or confederation to perform such governmental acts as were adapted to benefit the whole fraternity of States, but which could not remain the prerogative of any one State. Such power or right as that of declaring war, coining money, regulating commerce, conducting postal arrangements, &c., was of this character.

But sovereign as the States were in those earlier days of the Republic, it is doubtful now what is the condition of some of them. At the time the Government was formed, all the States were republican not only in form but in fact. The people of that day were republicans in the highest and best sense of that much-abused word. They were not wild fanatics, communists, or agrarians; they were not demagogues, thieves, or public plunderers, but a race of God-fearing and liberty-loving people—people who had sought America as the true home of liberty, and who were willing to do all and dare all to preserve the liberty once secured. Our anterevolutionist fathers were republicans of the right stripe. They fought eight years, not so much against oppression as for an idea, and that idea was republicanism, the eternal and indefeasible right of self-government.

The republican Colonies, with their liberties gained, became republican States, and the people of those States, in solemn convention assembled, formed the Constitution under which we live. In declaring that all power came to us directly from the States and the people of the States, do not understand me to intimate that these separate republics retained the right to enter and leave this solemn compact at their own pleasure. When they entered into a partnership and conceded certain powers and privileges, they could not recall the deed. On this subject my political faith and practice have always agreed, and have always been true to the Union. I have always believed and taught that it was not competent for the States to withdraw from the compact they had formed. They were no longer the proper judges upon this subject. However hard it might seem to some of them, it was a question the decision of which had passed to another tribunal.

The bill before us to-day proposes to regulate the internal affairs of the State of Louisiana. Now, we have the power to do this or we have not. It is a troublesome question to answer, and unless we act the State may drift into hopeless anarchy. Interference in this matter by Congress may be extraconstitutional without being directly unconstitutional, and certainly the legislative department of the Government is the proper one to manage and control affairs of this kind, if it has to be done at all.

One thing is certain; we must make up our minds to meet more than one case of this kind. Louisiana comes before us to-day, but to-morrow it will be Arkansas, Texas, South Carolina, or some other unreconstructed and unregenerate Commonwealth, will come up here with too many governors and too many rogues and rascals, and pray to us for help. Hitherto these prayers and petitions have mostly gone to the White House. Only last week South Carolina, through some of her best citizens, made an earnest appeal to the President, and although they were not exactly spurned from our republican court, as our fathers were from the throne of George III, rumor says they were received none too graciously.

But what is it that has brought about this bad state of things throughout the South, that beautiful and fruitful region that should be all Eden instead of half wilderness? Has it been desolated by pestilence and famine? No; but war, that other curse, has swept back and forth across this land like a tempest of fire; and when the war ended, then came a still greater curse. The millions that inhabited those States in a condition of servitude were all set free. I have no objection to that. But these millions of slaves, intensely ignorant, and utterly unqualified for so great a change, were at once elevated to the position of voters. A large majority of them at once became the tools of unprincipled demagogues, who sought that country for no better purpose than to prey upon the misfortunes of the people. A mighty army of pot-house politicians, knaves, rogues, and rascals gathered there from all parts of the country, guided by an instinct as fierce and as foul as that which leads vultures to a battle-field.

It is the existence of this ignorant and lately servile race in the South that has caused all this trouble, and made interference on the part of the General Government a necessity. In those States where this class of population is largely in the majority, ambitious and unprincipled demagogues have seized this opportunity to impose upon their ignorance and use their votes to secure for themselves political power. And where is this thing to end? Do you not see that in your haste to enfranchise one race you have subjugated and disfranchised another? Do you not see that you have inaugurated a cruel war of races, and that all the evil spirits of the country, men of desperate fortunes and more desperate sentiments, have flocked thither to seize, plunder, and destroy—to rob the country and ruin what they cannot steal? I have asked where this thing is to end. For myself, I can see no end to it. The future is gloomy enough, and it only remains for us to do what we can to lessen or avoid the present and coming evils.
